ABSTRACT

Conversations about the constitutionality of prohibitions on marriage for same-sex couples invariably reduce to the question of whether a meaningful analogy can be drawn between restrictions on same-sex marriage and antimiscegenation laws. In an effort to refocus this debate, this article considers the California Supreme Court's 1948 decision in Perez v. Sharp and its use by advocates in recent litigation to secure marriage rights for gay and lesbian couples. Opponents of marriage rights for members of the LGBT community frequently assert that dispatching Perez in these cases distorts the meaning of that decision and other similar precedents by drawing a false analogy between bans on interracial and same-sex marriage. Professor Lenhardt argues that, instead, Perez's appearance in recent cases helps to clarify the nature of the marriage rights at stake in Loving v. Virginia. She also contends that the strategic use of Perez serves to underscore the extent to which state antimiscegenation laws established not only racial, but also gender-based identity norms.

Finally, Professor Lenhardt asserts that Perez's use in recent marriage cases offers a way out of the "analogy" debate, focusing discussion on the nature and substantive effect of race and gender bars on marriage, rather than on a comparison of the groups seeking judicial redress for such restrictions. Professor Lenhardt concludes that a deeper appreciation of the extent to which state-imposed obstacles to marriage have operated to police identity, restrict opportunities for self-definition, and impede belonging can elucidate the true implications and citizenship effects of prohibitions on marriage for same-sex couples.

INTRODUCTION

[T]here is no redress for the serious restriction of the right of Negroes, Mulattoes, Mongolians, and Malays to marry. . . . A member of any of these races may find himself barred from marrying the person of his choice and that person to him may be irreplaceable. Human beings are bereft of worth and dignity by a doctrine that would make them as interchangeable as trains.

Justice Roger J. Traynor, Perez v. Sharp

Sixty-five years ago, two California factory workers, Sylvester Davis and Andrea Pérez, committed an act that would transform the terrain of race and ethnicity in the United States. They fell in love.  Determined to share the rest of their lives together, Sylvester, an African American just returning from service abroad in World War II, and Andrea, the daughter of Mexican immigrants, went to the Los Angeles county clerk several years later to obtain a marriage license. The county clerk, however, refused to grant them one. Sylvester and Andrea had run afoul of California’s antimiscegenation law.

On its face, this antimiscegenation law, which had been in effect from California’s entry into the union in 1850, did not appear to apply to Sylvester and Andrea. It declared that “marriages of white persons with negroes, Mongolians, members of the Malay race, or mulattoes” would be deemed illegal and void. Individuals of Mexican descent were nowhere mentioned in the statute. But, in California, Mexican Americans had long been regarded as white for purposes of marriage. Andrea was a mestizo who, by all accounts, did not appear phenotypically white and who, given the racial politics of Indeed, Andrea and Sylvester might never have met had World War II not occurred. The pressures of having to fulfill the production needs of wartime led companies that had previously declined to hire women and racial minorities to open their doors to these groups. See Josh Sides, L.A. City Limits: African American Los Angeles from the Great Depression to the Present 36 (2005). When the company loosened its hiring policies in the early to mid 1940s, it made it possible for Sylvester and Andrea to meet. See id. 372 n.10.

seek a marriage license in a sister-state without an antimiscegenation law, as many others did.\textsuperscript{19} They sought legal marriage on the same terms available to all Californians. And so, with the help of a civil rights attorney named Dan Marshall,\textsuperscript{20} they resolved to challenge California's antimiscegenation law.

This decision was significant, but not monumental in and of itself. Litigants had made various challenges to the application of antimiscegenation laws over the years.\textsuperscript{21} Relatively few, however, had sought to challenge the entire antimiscegenation apparatus. Andrea and Sylvester undertook this challenge and won.\textsuperscript{22} the "person of [one's] choice." In this sense, Perez, with its emphasis on choice and self-expression, goes beyond the more limited articulation of marriage rights that appears in the Supreme Court's decision in Loving.

In addition, advocates' utilization of Perez in recent cases helps to highlight the often overlooked fact that antimiscegenation laws served to shape societal norms regarding gender, as well as race. To be sure, interracial marriage bans worked to define the borders of racial identity and race. By now, the mechanisms employed by states in defining who, for example, was "white" or "black" for the purposes of antimiscegenation statutes are legend. But it is also true that, for those laws, race and gender were inextricably tied. Historians have for some time focused on the race and gender dimensions of antimiscegenation laws. Legal scholars have also begun to consider in important ways the intersecting identities regulated by such provisions. The strategic embrace of Perez in the marriage cases underscores this connection and, in doing so, promises to advance understanding about antimiscegenation laws, as well as restrictions on marriage for gay and lesbian couples.

Finally, by unearthing Perez and injecting it into both legal and public conversations about modern marriage, advocates have provided us with a path out of the "analogy debate" so often a part of discussions about the rights of gay men and lesbians to marry. Perez gives us an opportunity to interrogate not just the similarities or differences in the experiences of groups that have historically had limitations placed on their right to marry, but also the fundamental nature of the right to marry and the substantive effects of state marriage regulations. I argue that, by restricting intimate choice, identity-based restrictions on civil marriage improperly limit self-definition efforts, cabin expressions of human identity and intimacy, and have a negative impact on the ability of those affected to "belong" as full members of the citizenry or broader community in which they reside.

Part I discusses the California Supreme Court's decision in Perez, outlining the majority opinion drafted by then-Justice Roger Traynor, as well as the concurring opinions and dissent filed in the case. It also describes the treatment Perez received in the aftermath of the California Supreme Court's decision.

Part II addresses how and why same-sex marriage advocates have used Perez in recent litigation. I argue that advocates' deployment of the case, as previously discussed, uncovers important insights about Loving, marriage, and state efforts to regulate access to that institution.

Part III considers scholarship on the analogy often drawn between race and gender-based restrictions on marriage, and the objections of many opponents of marriage rights for gay and lesbian couples regarding the use of Perez and other antimiscegenation precedents in same-sex marriage litigation. I explain that, contrary to the assertions of opponents, efforts to cast decisions regarding race-based restrictions as cases about race alone are misguided. Perez itself makes clear the race and gender-based dimensions of antimiscegenation laws.

Part IV demonstrates how Perez—and the story of Andrea Pérez and Sylvester Davis's courtship at its center—can work to advance our thinking about the meaning of marriage, an institution that has undergone dramatic changes in recent decades, and the impact of government regulation in the marriage context. Whether a marriage prohibition is based on gender or race, its effect is to police the identity of the individuals seeking to marry, to ensure that their intimate choices and expressions of self comport with prevailing race and gender norms. With this common perspective and an understanding of the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Lawrence v. Texas, we move "beyond analogy" to the recognition that identity-based restrictions that prohibit someone from marrying the "person of [his or her] choice" inflict a significant citizenship harm with constitutional dimensions.

THE PÉREZ OPINIONS

The county clerk who denied Andrea Pérez and Sylvester Davis a marriage license in 1947 applied Sections 69 and 60 of the California Code. Section 69 provided that "no license may be issued authorizing the marriage of a white person with a Negro, mulatto, Mongolian or member of the Malay race." Section 60 further explained that "[a]ll marriages of white persons with negroes, Mongolians, members of the Malay race, or mulattoes are illegal and void." These provisions made California one of thirty states that proscribed interracial marriages at the time.

The Pérez plaintiffs' legal strategy was risky. Not only were antimiscegenation laws widely viewed as legitimate in the late 1940s, but no post-Reconstruction state or federal court had yet overturned one. Largely due

45. The first American statute specifically targeting interracial marriage was enacted in the colony of Maryland in 1664 and soon led to the adoption of other similar statutes, particularly by states in the South. Id. at 3; Lenhardt, The Story of Pérez v. Sharp, supra note 3, at 347-48. Significantly, antimiscegenation provisions had appeared in legislation adopted prior to that time. As I discuss in more detail in Part III, see infra at 133, a provision prohibiting sexual intimacy between Whites and Blacks was included in a matrilineal servitude statute in 1662. See Steven Martinot, Motherhood and the Invention of Race, 22 HYPATIA 79, 87-89 (2007).

It bears noting that California's antimiscegenation law was different in at least two respects from those that had been adopted by states in the American South, where proscriptions against interracial marriage and intimacy were long-standing, dating back to slavery. First, California's laws were more racially complex than those in effect in southern states, jurisdictions that focused primarily on relationships between Whites and Blacks. Moran, supra note 3, at 17. Second, the penalty for violating California's ban on interracial marriage was not as severe as that imposed in other states. See Lenhardt, The Story of Pérez v. Sharp, supra note 3, at 349. Whereas imprisonment was the likely punishment for couples in Virginia who transgressed racial lines in the area of intimacy, the sanction for a marriage in violation of Sections 60 or 69 was simply voiding the marriage. See id. The ramifications of voiding such marriages could, however, be far from simple, affecting issues of inheritance and property ownership, among other things. See infra 137-39.
to the U.S. Supreme Court's 1883 decision in Pace v. Alabama—which held that an Alabama law penalizing interracial adultery more severely than same-race adultery was not inconsistent with the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection guarantees courts were unwilling to find proscriptions on interracial marriage unconstitutional. In the Pace Court's view, race-based distinctions in law were unproblematic when they treated individuals within specific racial categories the same.

It thus no doubt came as a surprise to many when, on October 1, 1948, the California Supreme Court ruled in Andrea and Sylvester's favor by a 4-3 vote. Led by then-Justice Roger Traynor, who wrote the majority opinion, the Court invalidated California's antimiscegenation law and granted a writ of mandamus requiring the issuance of a marriage license to the couple. In doing so, it became the first court in the twentieth century to strike down an antimiscegenation law.

A. Justice Traynor's Majority Opinion

Justice Roger Traynor, a former tax professor at the University of California, Berkeley School of Law (Boalt Hall), was an unlikely person to author the majority opinion in Perez. In 1948, Traynor, who would later become Chief Justice of the court, was only in the seventh year of what would be his thirty-year tenure on the court. He had yet to write some of the opinions on issues of products liability, contract, and individual rights that would one day earn him a reputation as one of the "ablest judge[s] of his generation." There was also little to suggest that Traynor would be inclined to place himself at the vanguard of efforts to secure racial justice.

48. The Alabama statute imposed a prison term of two to seven years for interracial adultery, but imposed only a fine and up to six months imprisonment for same-race adultery. See Cheryl I. Harris, In the Shadow of Plessy, 7 U. PA. J. CONST. L. 867, 881 (2005).

The Court explained that Alabama's statute passed constitutional muster because "[w]hatever discrimination made in the punishment prescribed in the two sections is directed against the offense designated and not against the person of any particular color or race. The punishment of each offending person, whether white or black, is the same." Id.
53. Indeed, despite his ground-breaking opinion in Perez, few people associate Traynor with important decisions in the area of race. This said, I have suggested that his opinion in Perez
It may be that Traynor, a pragmatist committed to the "eliminat[ion] of legal rules that . . . no longer served their purpose"54 came to his opinion in Perez, at least initially, less out of a commitment to race issues per se than from an appreciation of the changing role of jurists at the time. As Justice Traynor wrote, the unfortunate decisions in U.S. Supreme Court cases such as Hirabayashi v. United States55 and Korematsu v. United States56 were only a few years old. Courts were actively engaged in determining how to understand the idea that "[o]nly the most exceptional circumstances can excuse discrimination on th[e] basis [of race] in the face of the equal protection clause."57 Within this context, Traynor properly concluded that his task as a jurist was to determine whether the race-based impairment of marriage rights effected by California law could be justified.58

The state relied heavily on the work of eugenicists in defending its antimiscegenation policy.59 In terms that prompted Andrea and Sylvester's attorney to question how "a servant of the people . . . [could be] bold enough to argue for the validity of a statute upon [white superiority] grounds,"60 the state argued that interracial marriages—"especially with respect to the 'Negro race,' which he deemed 'biologically inferior to the white'—produced 'undesirable biological results.'"61 The state also argued that interracial marriages created social problems,62 including the "birth of interracial children who, as the offspring of parents 'lost to shame,' would be 'social outcasts.'"63

For his part, however, Traynor relied on new research by social scientists such as Gunnar Myrdal, Franz Boas, and Otto Kleinberg, which, as the Perez plaintiffs' final brief to the court noted, discredited the research of the eugenicists cited by the state.64 Justice Traynor thus gave little credence to the notion that California's law was justified because it served purposes such as avoiding social tensions or "prevent[ing] the Caucasian race from being contaminated by races whose members are by nature physically and mentally inferior to Caucasians.” Likewise, he rejected completely the notion that Whites could reasonably be deemed superior to Blacks and other non-whites, commenting that “the date [sic] on which Caucasian superiority is based have undergone considerable re-evaluation by social and physical scientists in the past two decades.”

Indeed, Justice Traynor soon concluded, using the language of the new strict scrutiny analysis, that the state’s asserted purposes were simply not “compelling.” Perhaps as a way to address what he likely regarded as Andrea’s racial mis-identification in the case, Justice Traynor also concluded, though it was not necessary to the resolution of the case, that the racial categories employed by the state were “illogical and discriminatory,” and arguably rendered the state’s statutes “void for vagueness.” Among other things, he criticized the state for not explicitly stating which officials had responsibility for making determinations about racial identity or clarifying how such determinations should be made—for example, by “physical appearance,” “genealogical research,” or some other mechanism. He also bemoaned the legislature’s inattention to the perplexing issue of how persons of mixed ancestry should be regarded under the statute. Justice Traynor found absurd the notion under California’s statute that a “Mulatto can marry a Negro” or, for example, that “[a] person having five-eighths Mongolian blood and three-eighths white blood could properly marry another [sic] person of preponderantly Mongolian blood” under the statute, but white and black persons could not marry one another.

For modern-day advocates of marriage rights for gay men and lesbians, however, the most important part of Traynor’s opinion is his analysis of the fundamental right to marry. At bottom, he held that the Perez case was not about race alone, but also about the right to marry “the person of one’s choice.”

Two factors make this particular formulation of the case noteworthy. First, it was considerably ahead of its time. The Supreme Court did not recognize marriage as a fundamental right at all until 1967 in Loving, when it invalidated the antimiscegenation statutes then in effect on Fourteenth Amendment

Second, Justice Traynor, by framing the issue in this way, managed to avoid entirely the unfavorable precedent established by the Supreme Court’s decision in \textit{Pace v. Alabama}.\footnote{106 U.S. 583 (1882).} \textit{Pace} took the position that race-based restrictions on interracial intimacy posed no constitutional problem, so long as Whites and Blacks were treated equally.\footnote{Id. at 585.} Justice Traynor—asserting that “human beings . . . [were not] “as interchangeable as trains”—dismissed the separate-but-equal understandings reflected in \textit{Pace} as applicable primarily to cases involving access to trains and education—goods that, in 1948, prior to the decision in \textit{Brown}, were still thought capable of being equalized even where racially segregated by law.\footnote{Id. at 25.} Such cases, he explained were “inapplicable.”\footnote{Id. at 21.} Reasoning that “the essence of the right to marry is the freedom to join in marriage with the person of one’s choice,” Justice Traynor concluded that “a segregation statute for marriage necessarily impairs the right to marry.”\footnote{Id. at 21.} This is so, he reasoned, because, to the individual prevented “by law from marrying the person of his choice . . . that [other] person to him may be irreplaceable.”\footnote{Id. at 25.}

\textbf{B. The Concurring and Dissenting Opinions}

The \textit{Perez} court split along several axes. Significantly, the concurring justices did not object to Justice Traynor’s articulation of the marriage rights at stake. Rather, they wrote separately to communicate their respective ideas about the best rationale for the judgment rendered in the case. Justice Edmonds, a Christian Scientist, drafted a concurrence adopting the view, urged in initial briefs filed on Andrea and Sylvester’s behalf,\footnote{Lenhardt, \textit{The Story of Perez v. Sharp}, \textit{supra} note 3, at 353.} that the case was first and foremost about the free exercise of religion under the First Amendment, not racial discrimination.\footnote{Perez, 198 P.2d at 34 (Edmonds, J., concurring); see also Orenstein, \textit{supra} note 3, at 390. Significantly, at least one early case seeking marriage rights for gay men and lesbians seems to have involved a similar claim. See Jones v. Hallahan, 501 S.W.2d 588, 590 (Ky. Ct. App. 1973) (rejecting, \textit{inter alia}, the claim that the refusal to grant a marriage license to a lesbian couple violated religious freedom and imposed a punishment).}

The concurrence written by Justice Jesse W. Carter, and joined by Justice Phil Gibson, in contrast, took issue with Traynor’s contention that new social science research had somehow undermined the bases for California’s antimiscegenation provision. Challenging the idea that the validity of the state law was effectively an empirical question,\textsuperscript{82} Carter and Gibson asserted that, under normative principles of equality set forth in the Fourteenth Amendment, the Declaration of Independence, and the recently-enacted Charter of the United Nations,\textsuperscript{83} Sections 60 and 69 had essentially never been constitutional.\textsuperscript{84} In their minds, these provisions "violate[d] the very premise on which [the United States] and its Constitution were built . . . ."\textsuperscript{85} Citing Korematsu, they emphasized that, under strict scrutiny, "'[p]ressing public necessity may sometimes justify the existence of such restrictions; racial antagonism never can.'"\textsuperscript{86}

The three justices in dissent—Justice John W. Schenk, B. Rey Schauer, and Homer R. Spence—chastised Traynor and the other members of the Perez majority for invalidating nearly one hundred years of California law. In doing so, they noted that twenty-nine other states had similar antimiscegenation statutes on their books and that every federal and state court to consider the issue since Reconstruction had upheld statutes prohibiting interracial sex and marriage.\textsuperscript{87} Above all, the dissenters took issue with Justice Traynor's contention that something more than equal treatment was required under Supreme Court precedent such as Pace. They gave no credence whatsoever to the idea that the fundamental right to marry included the right to marry "the person of one's choice." It was enough, Justice Schenk wrote at one point in his dissenting opinion, that "each petitioner has the right and the privilege of marrying within his or her own group."\textsuperscript{88}

C. The Aftermath of the Perez Court's Decision

The opinion drafted by Justice Traynor in Perez led to monumental changes for California marriage law.\textsuperscript{89} Andrea and Sylvester, for their part, were able to wed in their home church after years of waiting.\textsuperscript{90} But Perez did not translate into change outside of that state. There was no immediate national movement to remove antimiscegenation laws from the state codes.\textsuperscript{91} Nor did

"LOVING” PEREZ IN RECENT MARRIAGE LITIGATION

Were it not for advocates of marriage rights for gay men and lesbians, the footnote mention Perez received in Loving might have been the most recognition it ever received. In recent years, however, advocates in these cases have successfully cast Perez as a foundational decision, one without which discussions about the place of marriage in current society cannot be meaningfully conducted. Indeed, the briefs filed and/or oral arguments made in almost every case challenging gender-based marriage restrictions in the last ten years has featured Perez in some way. As a result, same-sex marriage on Perez in the briefs they filed before the Supreme Court. See Brief for Appellants, Loving, 388 U.S. at 38

Marriage is perhaps the most important of all human relationships. We think it clear that the ‘liberty’ which is protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment includes the right to marry. Justice Traynor so held in his opinion in Perez v. Sharp, which invalidated California’s anti-miscegenation statute. (citations omitted). Wallenstein notes that the Lovings also cited Perez in the Virginia Supreme Court. Peter Wallenstein, Race, Marriage, and the Law of Freedom: Alabama and Virginia, 1860s-1960s, 70 CHI-KENT L. REV. 371, 425 (1994). The brief quoted directly from Traynor’s decision: “If the right to marry is a fundamental right, then it must be conceded that an infringement of that right by means of a racial restriction is an unlawful infringement of one’s liberty.” Id. (quoting Appellant’s Petition for Writ of Error at 12, Loving v. Virginia, No. 6163 (Va. 1965)).

98. See Lenhardt, The Story of Perez v. Sharp, supra note 3, at 364. Warren was serving as the Governor of California at the time the decision in Perez was rendered. See Orenstein, supra note 3, at 400, 401. There is virtually no way that he was unaware of the decision, which made headline news in California and in other areas of the country. Field, supra note 51, at 40-41; Orenstein, supra note 3, at 400-03; Brilliant, supra note 3, at 148. Indeed, it makes sense that Warren would be intimately familiar with the particular aspects of Justice Traynor’s majority, especially given that the opinion was so novel for the time and required some action on the part of the legislature. Orenstein, supra note 3, at 401. Interestingly, Dara Orenstein’s article on Perez suggests that Warren was advised not to push the legislature to remove Sections 60 and 69 from the California Code in the wake of the California Supreme Court’s decision. Id. As indicated above, California did not repeal its antimiscegenation law provisions until 1959, six years after Warren left the office of Governor. See id.; supra note 91.

100. Elsewhere, I have advanced several theories for why Perez has received less attention than Loving in cases and scholarship on marriage and antimiscegenation law. See Lenhardt, The Story of Perez v. Sharp, supra note 3, at 365-70. Among other things I argue that the fact that Perez—to the extent that it involved an African American-Latino relationship rather than one that was black-white—was an anti-paradigm antimiscegenation case partially accounts for its failure to be recognized more widely. Id.

101. The informal survey of briefs, opinions, and oral arguments that follows in the text is based on research relating to the following 12 cases raising questions about same-sex couples’ advocates have essentially rescued Perez from legal obscurity.\textsuperscript{102} In this section, I explore the ways in which same-sex marriage advocates have used Perez in recent marriage litigation.

\textit{A. Perez as a Call for Judicial Bravery}

The current battle for gay and lesbian marriage rights is being waged, for the most part, in state courts.\textsuperscript{103} Because of their concern about the direction of federal equal protection and due process doctrine,\textsuperscript{104} and the perceived hostility of an increasingly conservative U.S. Supreme Court to potential marriage claims, same-sex couples have generally refrained from initiating marriage-related challenges in federal court.\textsuperscript{105} Instead, they have crafted a litigation

102. As I indicated previously, relatively few scholars have focused on Perez's contributions to conversations about marriage. See Lenhardt, \textit{The Story of Perez v. Sharp}, supra note 3 at 342. The lack of attention paid to Perez in legal scholarship, particularly in the years right after Perez was decided, is striking. Two law review articles in 1953 and 1957 discuss Perez. See David Bruce Harriman, Comment, \textit{The Void for Vagueness Rule in California}, 41 CALIF. L. REV. 523, 532 (1953); Appellants' Brief, Hernandez v. Robles, 7 N.Y.3d 338, No. 103434/04, (N.Y. 2006); Appellants' Brief, Baker v. State, No. 98-32, 170 Vt. 194 (Vt. 1999); Respondents' Corrected Brief, Andersen v. strategy designed to take advantage of state constitutional provisions and judicial precedent often thought to be more liberal and expansive in their protection of individual rights.\textsuperscript{106} Perez has been at the forefront of this initiative; it serves as a virtual call for judicial bravery by judges tasked with deciding whether long-standing restrictions on marriage for gay and lesbian couples should be deemed unconstitutional.

Of course, Loving also plays a central role in current litigation. But, given the context in which it was decided, Loving's message to lower courts is comparatively muted. The U.S. Supreme Court actively avoided addressing the constitutionality of bars on interracial marriage—widely regarded as the third rail of race relations—for years,\textsuperscript{107} and then only did so after they had already decided comparatively less controversial issues, such as those concerning racial segregation in public schools, parks, restaurants, hotels, housing, transportation, and voting, among other things.108 By the time the Court decided Loving, nearly half of the states that had antimiscegenation laws on their books when Andrea and Sylvester filed their lawsuit had repealed them.109 In many respects, some of the hardest work had already been done.

The context for the California Supreme Court’s decision in Perez was quite different. In 1948, a full majority of states had antimiscegenation provisions in effect. Additionally, all of the judicial opinions in the area had upheld these statutes against challenge.110 Further, public opinion was firmly against interracial marriage.111 For judges hearing cases seeking marriage rights for gay and lesbian couples, the Perez context is more analogous to their situation than that of Loving, where the Court was asked to deliver the final blow to a discriminatory regime already in decline.112

Rev. 93, 114 (1993) (describing the “strong public sentiment” against interracial marriage at the time of both Perez and Loving); see also Field, supra note 51, at 21 (explaining that “[a] 1958 Gallup poll showed that 92 percent of western whites opposed miscegenation. Forty-eight percent of the adults surveyed in a 1965 Gallup poll approved of criminal antimiscegenation laws, 46 percent disapproved, and six percent had no opinion); id. (explaining that “[s]eventy-two percent of the adults surveyed in a 1968 Gallup poll disapproved of marriage between whites and people of color, 20 percent approved, and eight percent had no opinion”); Serena Mayeri, The Strange Career of Jane Crow: Sex Segregation and the Transformation of Anti-Discrimination Discourse, 18 Yale J.L. & Human. 187, 204 (2006) (noting that a 1958 Gallup poll found that one percent of white southerners, and five percent of non-southern whites, approved of marriage between blacks and whites).

But at the time Loving was decided, antimiscegenation laws were already on their way out. . . . So while the Supreme Court ruling certainly hastened th[e] demise [of antimiscegenation laws], the criminalization of interracial marriage had already suffered a cultural blow that was more wounding than the constitutional one. See also Liptak, supra note 30, at 3 (quoting gay marriage opponent, Maggie Gallagher of the
By invoking Perez, advocates acknowledge this reality and implore judges to assume a countermajoritarian stance in favor of protecting constitutional rights, rather than public opinion. The lower court argument made by attorney Shannon Minter in Woo v. Lockyer, a case among those recently decided by the California Supreme Court in In re Marriage Cases, is illustrative:

In 1948, when Andrea Perez and Sylvester Davis brought a writ of action to challenge California’s ban on interracial marriage, they had a lot against them. Not a single court at any level anywhere in the country had ever invalidated such a law. As the dissent [in Perez] noted, such laws had been in effect in this country since before our national independence and in California since our first legislative session in 1850. A majority of other states had similar laws, and several had gone as far as to amend their state constitutions to prohibit interracial marriages. In California, the law enjoyed strong, indeed overwhelming popular support. Nonetheless, the court ruled in their favor, and looking back on the decision several decades later, any other result now seems inconceivable. In ruling on their claim, the Woo couples ask this Court to envision how the decision in this case may be seen in future years, by those similarly detached from the passions and prejudices of our day. We believe those future generations will recognize the inherent equality of lesbians and gay men, and will agree that striking laws that exclude them from marriage was the only constitutionally correct choice.

Institute for Marriage and Public Policy as saying, “When the court moved to strike down the interracial marriage laws . . . the democratic process was in the process of getting rid of these laws. What’s happening now is exactly the opposite: more and more states are moving to protect marriage.”). Some sources indicate that approximately 72 percent of the general public disapproves of marriage for same-sex couples. See Adam Nagourney & Megan Thee, Young Americans Are Leaning Left, New Poll Finds, N.Y. Times, June 27, 2007, at A1. Notably, younger Americans are said to be more supportive of marriage rights for gay men and lesbians. Id. \[\textit{Perez} \text{ shows that, where precious constitutional rights are at stake, judges need not give deference to discrimination, whether supported by the legislature, tradition, public opinion, or all three.}^{116} \text{ And in invoking it, advocates not only underscore that that precedent exists for the bold rulings they seek, but also remind state courts in particular that a courageous decision on civil rights grounds now may very well help to effect a significant change in doctrine later.}^{117} \text{ \textit{Loving}, in many ways, stands as a public testimony to Justice Traynor and the foresight the \textit{Perez} Court showed in being willing to uphold Andrea and Sylvester's right to marry across racial lines.}

\textit{B. Perez as a Rejoinder to Analogy and Equal Application Arguments}

The deployment of \textit{Perez} in recent marriage cases also adds substantive content to advocates' claims for gay and lesbian marriage rights. Advocates use \textit{Perez}'s "person of one's choice" language to focus attention on what gay and lesbian couples seek in current marriage cases: the recognition of a shared humanity with others whose intimate relationships are eligible to be recognized by the state. \textit{Loving}, of course, includes language very relevant to the claims for marriage rights advanced by gay and lesbian litigants. Chief Justice Warren's assertion that "[m]arriage is one of the 'basic civil rights of man,' fundamental to our very existence and survival" arguably provides strong support for the extension of marriage to same-sex couples.\(^{118}\) Other aspects of the majority

Mary Bonauto, the attorney who litigated \textit{Goodridge} has written persuasively about \textit{Perez}'s potential inspirational effect:

\begin{quote}
I draw solace from California's \textit{Perez} case where that state's high court, in a four-to-three decision with a bitter dissent, ended race discrimination in marriage in that state. It was the first state supreme court to do so, and the existing legal precedents around the country were contrary, and the cultural landscape was inauspicious. Yet, many of us are now grateful that the court saw the issue as one of human equality and dignity and broke what had been a logjam of discrimination. A large number of states repealed their bans on interracial marriage by the time the U.S. Supreme Court decided \textit{Loving v. Virginia} nineteen years later. While Dr. King was correct that progress is anything but inevitable, it is certainly a better bet that with determined time and effort, LGBT people will be part of constitutional history in this country, a story of the "extension of constitutional rights and protections to people once formerly ignored or excluded."

opinion in Loving work to reinforce assertions about the effect of identity-based restrictions on civil marriage. Consider Warren’s conclusion that “[t]he Fourteenth Amendment requires that the freedom of choice to marry not be restricted by invidious racial discriminations. Under our Constitution, the freedom to marry, or not marry, a person of another race resides with the individual and cannot be infringed by the State.”

Nevertheless advocates invariably look to supplement the language of Loving in substantial ways, not merely with other marriage cases—for example, Zablocki v. Redhail or Turner v. Safely—decided by the Supreme Court, but with Perez.

A survey of relevant briefs makes clear that Perez gets employed to make a wide variety of substantive points. Chief among these is the argument that, as a constitutional matter, a meaningful analogy can be drawn between the antimiscegenation and same-sex marriage contexts. The claim here is not that the oppression experienced by African Americans is exactly the same as that confronted by members of the LGBT community. Rather, it is that the marriage rights sought by gay and lesbian couples are not fundamentally different.

King County, No. 75934-1, 138 P.3d 963 (Wash. 2006) (describing Loving as “the cornerstone of privacy and due process protection of the right to marry . . . [in which the Court] made clear that protection of the individual right of choice is inextricably interwoven with the special role of marriage”); Plaintiff-Appellants’ Brief at 50-51, Hernandez, No. 103434/04, 7 N.Y.3d 338 (“The Loving Court understood that the liberty at stake—deeply rooted in history and guaranteed to all—was the established fundamental freedom to choose with whom one will spend daily married life.”).

119. Loving, 388 U.S. at 12.
120. 434 U.S. 374 (1978).
122. Briefs in recent cases have, inter alia, employed Perez in refuting claims that public opinion, history, and tradition all dictate an interpretation of marriage rights limited to heterosexual choices in life partners. See Brief of the Plaintiff-Appellants at 46-47, Hernandez, No. 103434/04, 7 N.Y. 3d 338 (addressing public opinion); Respondents’ Corrected Answering Brief at 59, 61, In re Marriage Cases, No. A110451, 49 Cal. Vermont, No. 98-32, 170 Vt. 194, 229 (Vt. 1999).

Further, Perez has surfaced in response to arguments about polygamy and the possibility that interpreting the Due Process Clause to reach the right to marry a person of the same sex would open the door to claims to this and other controversial social arrangements. For example, the brief submitted by the appellant in Goodridge—the Massachusetts Supreme Court decision that eventually led to the adoption of marriage rights for gay men and lesbians in that state—explains that the right to marry “the person of one’s choice,” recognized in Perez, is so clearly oriented toward monogamous romantic partners that it, by definition, would not encompass polygamous marriages. Brief of Plaintiff-Appellant’s Brief at 47, Goodridge v. Dept. of Pub. Health, No. SJC-08860, 798 N.E.2d 941 (Mass. 2003) (“The point is not merely semantic; the exclusivity of marriage flows from the companionate vision of marriage as two people pledging themselves to one another that the courts have long embraced.”).

123. See, e.g., Respondents’ Opening Brief on the Merits at 3, Marriage Cases, No. A110451, 149 P.3d 737 (“California’s marriage statutes deny lesbian and gay persons the fundamental right to join in marriage with the person of one’s choice. The freedom guaranteed by this established right to marry implicates autonomy, privacy, associational, and expressive Loving, of course, suggests this in holding that the right to marry is among the “basic civil rights of man.”

But advocates in cases such as Goodridge v. Department of Public Health and Lewis v. Harris have still had to defend against claims that Loving is only a case about race and, thus, does not encompass the right to marry sought by LGBT couples, and that the marriage right afforded by the Constitution extends to heterosexual marriage alone. Here Perez, which purports to interpret the Fourteenth Amendment rather than just California law, has been employed to good effect.

The plaintiffs in Goodridge, for example, emphasized that Justice Traynor “aptly observed that ‘the right to join in marriage with the person of one’s choice’ is at least as protected as the liberty rights to have offspring or send one’s child to a particular school.” Other litigants have simply argued that “the right to make personal decisions central to marriage would be hollow if,” as the arguments of same-sex marriage opponents could be read to imply, “the government [could properly] dictat[e] one’s marriage partner.”

Perez also surfaces frequently in efforts to rebut the argument that equal application of the prohibition of same-sex marriage to both sexes renders it constitutionally legitimate. Echoing the arguments of Alabama in Pace and interests that lie at the very heart of personal dignity and self-determination.” (quotations and citations omitted); Respondents' Corrected Answering Brief at 20-22, Marriage Cases, No. A110451, 149 P.3d 737 (“Since Perez, California courts have continued to recognize marriage as a fundamental right... The liberty at stake in both cases – the right of every adult person to choose whom to marry – is deeply rooted in history and tradition.”).

124. 388 U.S. at 12.
127. The plaintiff-appellants in Goodridge countered this argument by noting that “[i]f the Supreme Court had begun its analysis by considering whether there was a fundamental, historic right to ‘miscegenic’ or mixed-race marriages in Loving v. Virginia... its conclusions would have been very different.” Reply Brief of the Plaintiff Appellants at 22, Goodridge, No. SJC-08860, 798 N.E.2d 941. See, e.g., Respondents' Corrected Answering Brief at 33, Marriage Cases, No. A110451, 149 P.3d 737 (“Although the statute 'equally' prohibits men and women from marrying a person of the same sex, mere equal application to different groups does not negate the injury to individuals.”); Plaintiff-Appellants' Brief at 72-3, Hernandez, No. 103434/04, 7 N.Y.3d 338 (noting that Perez rebuffed the equal application argument by asserting that the question is not whether different racial groups are treated equally, since the right to marry belongs to individuals); Plaintiff-Appellants' Brief at 57-8, Goodridge, No. SJC-08860, 798 N.E.2d 941

Critically, rather than comparing the experience of whites and persons of color as groups, the courts found that limiting an individual's choice of whom he or she could marry based on the individuals' races was racial discrimination... Just as those courts had no problem detecting a racial classification at work, so is there a sex-based classification here. The analogy to Perez... is logically and analytically irrefutable. (emphasis in the original); Appellants' Brief, Baker v. State, No. 98-32, 170 Vt. 194 (Vt. 1999) (“The court properly dismissed the suggestion that California's anti-miscegenation laws were not
Virginia in Loving, the state defenders in recent marriage cases have argued that, since all men are prevented from marrying men and all women are barred from marrying women, provisions banning civil marriage for same-sex couples do not violate state and federal equal protection guarantees. Advocates, however, point to Perez to make the case that the Constitution guarantees a more robust conception of equality than such arguments suggest. In this connection, they cite Justice Traynor’s insight that the right to marriage in modern society must mean the right of an individual to select the “person of one’s choice” as a life partner.

C. Perez as a Lens on Loving

So far, “loving” Perez in the ways just described has not, in most cases, achieved the results desired by the gay and lesbian plaintiffs in recent marriage litigation. There have been some important victories however. Nearly sixty years after it recognized the constitutional right of interracial couples to marry, the California Supreme Court recently invoked \textit{Perez} repeatedly in concluding in \textit{In re Marriage Cases} that the unions of same-sex couples are entitled to the same official recognition currently extended to the unions of opposite-sex couples. For example, the court cited \textit{Perez}, its focus on the "essence and substance of the right to marry,"\textsuperscript{135} and its refusal to consider "the fact that discrimination against interracial marriage 'was sanctioned by the state for many years' [as] a reason to reject the plaintiffs' claim in that case"\textsuperscript{136} in concluding, \textit{inter alia}, that "history alone does not provide a justification for interpreting the constitutional right to marry as protecting only one's ability to enter into an officially recognized family relationship with a person of the opposite sex."\textsuperscript{137} Similarly, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court relied heavily on \textit{Perez} in invalidating Massachusetts' restriction on same-sex marriage in \textit{Goodridge}, as the following passage illustrates:

As both \textit{Perez} and \textit{Loving} made clear, the right to marry means little if it does not include the right to marry the person of one's choice, subject to appropriate restrictions in the interests of public health, safety, and welfare . . . In this case, as in \textit{Perez} and \textit{Loving}, a statute deprives individuals of access to an institution of fundamental legal, personal, and social significance—the institution of marriage—because of a single trait: skin color in \textit{Perez} and \textit{Loving}, sexual orientation here. As it did in \textit{Perez} and \textit{Loving}, history must yield to a more fully developed understanding of the invidious quality of the discrimination.\textsuperscript{138}

The result achieved in \textit{In re Marriage Cases} and \textit{Goodridge}, however, has not been replicated in other jurisdictions.\textsuperscript{139} Nevertheless, the use of \textit{Perez} in recent marriage cases has been successful in other ways. In addition to positioning Perez as an authority to which marriage opponents must respond, advocates have used Perez to raise many important questions about the meaning of Loving and the institution of marriage itself.

Analyses of Loving frequently focus on the language providing that "the racial classifications [in Virginia’s antimiscegenation statute] must stand on their own justification, as measures designed to maintain White Supremacy." Many regard this as the "key sentence" in the case, critical to understanding both the Court and issues of race and equality. Without disputing Loving’s significance as a race case, advocates effectively argue that the equal protection

140. This may be the best test of whether “loving” Perez has been effective as a litigation strategy. Numerous courts and/or judges have deemed it relevant to address Perez along with Loving in one way or another. With the exception of In re Marriage Cases, Goodridge and the Hawaii Supreme Court’s 1993 decision in Baehr, 852 P.2d 44, a good many of the citations to Perez appear in majority or concurring opinions concluding that marriage rights should not be extended to same-sex couples. See, e.g., Conaway, 932 A.2d 571; Andersen, 138 P.3d 963, 1001; see also Singer v. Harra, 11 Wash. App. 247, 255 n.8 (Wash. Ct. App. 1974) (rejecting analogy to Loving and Perez in concluding that prohibition on marriage for same-sex couples did not violate state law). For obvious reasons, the other citations to Perez appear in opinions dissenting in whole or part from judgments against same-sex plaintiffs. See Hernandez, 7 N.Y.3d at 380 (Kaye, C.J., dissenting); Anderson, 138 P.3d at 1022 (Fairhurst, J., dissenting); Baker, 170 Vt. at 242 (Johnson, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). Ordinarily, references to a case that appears in a dissenting opinion or that is otherwise less than uniformly positive would suggest a decision’s tenuous status in case law. In this context, however, I suggest that these judicial references highlight Perez’s emergence as a significant marriage precedent.

The striking reference to White Supremacy—by a unanimous Court, capitalizing both words and speaking in these terms for the only time in the nation’s history—was designed to get at the core of Virginia’s argument that discrimination on the basis of participation in mixed marriages was not discrimination on the basis of race. The Supreme Court appeared to be making the following argument. Even though the ban on racial marriage treats blacks and whites alike—even though there is formal equality—the ban is transparently an effort to keep the races separate and, by so doing, to maintain the form and conception of racial differences that are indispensable to White Supremacy.

dimensions of the Court's decision in that case are not as limited as some suggest and ultimately speak to the need to eliminate any identity-based obstacles to an institution as socially significant as marriage.\(^{144}\)

Even more, litigants in recent marriage cases suggest that, while the portions of Loving sounding in equal protection are important, attention must also be directed at the principles underlying those parts that deal with the scope of the right to marry under the Due Process Clause.\(^{145}\) The focus on this aspect of Loving is a reminder that Chief Justice Warren could have ended his opinion in Loving with a statement about the dangers of racial classification and the illegitimacy of a white supremacist agenda, but decided instead to go further. The unmistakable message here is that the Loving Court's statements about marriage mean something and that courts in current cases cannot run away from their obligation to determine exactly what that meaning is.

This said, it would be wrong to understand advocates' focus on Loving's due process elements as a complete endorsement of the view of marriage adopted by the Court. If anything, advocates' use of Perez exposes how anemic Chief Justice Warren's language is compared to Justice Traynor's wonderfully expressive statement about "the person of one's choice."\(^{146}\) Implicitly, they suggest that Loving itself is lacking in its articulation of the fundamental right to marry.

Briefs filed in recent cases attempt to drill down on the meaning and significance of the right to marry in a modern society in a way that, as I discuss in Part IV, Warren's short opinion in Loving simply does not and perhaps could not given the era in which it was written.\(^{147}\) For marriage to have meaning as \(^{145}\) Others have also urged a focus on the due process components of Loving. See James E. Fleming, Constructing the Substantive Constitution, 72 TEX. L. REV. 211, 257 n.231 (1993) (taking Sunstein and others to task for, inter alia, focusing on the equal protection portions of Loving in constitutional law casebooks, but giving those relating to due process short shrift).

\(^{146}\) In a recent book chapter on Perez, I criticized portions of Justice Traynor's majority opinion addressing race. See Lenhardt, The Story of Perez v. Sharp, supra note 3, at 368. Among other things, I suggested that part of the inattention to Perez over the years might be explained by Traynor's failure to reject in strong terms the white supremacist agenda underlying California's antimiscegenation law, as Warren did when considering Virginia's ban on interracial marriage. Id. Obviously, Traynor dealt with the portions of his opinion concerning marriage in a different, far more inspirational way.

\(^{147}\) Chief Justice Warren may not have been free to include all of the issues that he thought relevant in deciding Loving, which might explain his opinion's brevity. Securing a majority of votes for the judgment was an obvious priority. See The Supreme Court in Conference (1940-1985) 696 (Del Dickson ed., 2001). As it was, reports indicate that Warren one of the "basic civil rights of man," advocates argue that it must entail more than the freedom to choose from a category of individuals prescribed by the state. It must, they maintain, involve the authority to select "the person of one's choice" and, in doing so, to make a statement before one's community that ultimately affirms the self as well as the existence and social significance of an intimate human connection achieved with another person.

THE RACE AND GENDER DIMENSIONS OF ANTIMISCEGENATION LAWS

By using Perez in their arguments, advocates have injected the case into a protracted and often virulent debate about the utility and appropriateness—from a constitutional as well as a historical perspective—of drawing an analogy between antimiscegenation laws and same-sex marriage restrictions. Those who take issue with the analogy constitute a strange collection of supporters and opponents of marriage rights for same-sex couples. For supporters, concerns about the utilization of the analogy typically focus on matters of civil rights strategy or the impact of the analogy on understandings of race and gender hierarchies. Some supporters, for example, contend, that the way the analogy gets advanced threatens civil rights advancements for racial minorities, gay men, and lesbians alike.\footnote{Others maintain that the analogy obscures the} operation of white racism and privilege within the LGBT rights movement;\textsuperscript{152} inappropriately constructs the gay community as white and thus makes invisible the experiences of gay men and lesbians of color;\textsuperscript{153} masks the operation of homophobia within minority communities;\textsuperscript{154} and unwisely imports heterosexist norms into the fight for gay and lesbian rights.\textsuperscript{155}

In contrast, opponents of the recognition of marriage rights for gay and lesbian couples object to the analogy primarily due to concerns about its effects on the institution of marriage. For example, in addition to asserting that the analogy misrepresents the history of race in the United States,\textsuperscript{156} many same-sex marriage opponents have argued that the analogy signals an assault on the institution of marriage and represents an attempt to undermine what many consider its essential nature and purpose: the union between a man and a woman.\textsuperscript{157} One 2005 law review article called judicial opinions recognizing the \item \textsuperscript{156} Significantly, a number of African American leaders have been particularly vocal on this point, publicly criticizing the contention—often made through the use of civil rights rhetoric and imagery—that the struggle for gay and lesbian rights is analogous to that waged for civil rights. See, e.g., Michael Paulson, \textit{Black Clergy Rejection Stirs Gay Marriage Backers}, \textit{Boston Globe}, February 10, 2004, at B1, available at http://www.boston.com/news/local/articles/2004/02/10/black_clergy_rejection_stirs-gay_marriage_backers/ (discussing similar position taken by African Americans in the Boston area); see also Brian Debose, \textit{Black Caucus Resists Comparison of Gay 'Marriage' to Civil Rights}, \textit{Wash. Times}, March 15, 2004, at A1 (reporting reluctance on the part of members of the Black Congressional Caucus to treat gay marriage as civil rights issue). The Reverend Jesse Jackson took issue with the drawing of this analogy in a 2004 speech delivered at Harvard Law School. See Keith Boykin, \textit{Whose Dream: Why the Black Church Opposes Gay Marriage}, \textit{Village Voice}, March 24, 2004, at 46, available at http://www.villagevoice.com/news/0421,boykin,53751,1.html (“‘Gays were never called three-fifths human in the Constitution,’ he said, and ‘they did not require the Voting Rights Act to have the right to vote.’”) The fundamental concern on the part of some—though certainly not all African Americans—seems to be that the use of the analogy extends to gays and lesbians a history and perhaps a degree of public empathy to which they are not entitled.

\item \textsuperscript{157} A document posted on the website of the Family Research Council, a conservative non-profit, is illustrative of how this argument gets articulated. The document emphasizes that analogy a "[b]etrayal of Perez and Loving." It asserts, inter alia, that "the Perez/Loving analogy advances a superficial analogy that masks a deep disanalogy . . . between the intention of Perez and Loving to protect marriage from appropriation for nonmarriage purposes and the intention of the present marriage project to make such an appropriation."

At the crux of this last set of arguments is a belief that, in the end, Perez and other similar precedents are cases about race and nothing more. Obviously, Perez says a great deal about race. Elsewhere, I have argued that Perez represents an early insight into the "cruel lunacy" of government efforts to define race through antimiscegenation laws. Perez also exemplifies early applications of strict scrutiny in the race context and serves to address the relationship between African Americans and Latinos, among other things.

But the contention that Perez does not speak to matters beyond race rests on a fundamental misunderstanding of that case and the nature of the laws it invalidated. While antimiscegenation laws like the one Andrea and Sylvester encountered when they went to the county clerk’s office seeking a marriage license were an attempt, on their face, to regulate race and racial intimacy, they also operated to define and shape other societal norms. Importantly, bans on interracial marriage played a critical role in identifying gender roles for Whites, as well as men and women of color, in much the same way that current restrictions on marriage help to establish gender hierarchies.

A. The Historical Intersection of Race and Gender in Antimiscegenation Law

"[R]ace, sexuality, [and] gender . . . have been mutually conditioning in the production of American whiteness," and in social structures and norms.

"[H]omosexual relationships are not marriage. That is, they simply do not fit the minimum necessary condition for a marriage to exist—namely, the union of a man and woman." Dorr, Gender, supra note 36; Pascoe, Race, Gender, and Intercultural Relations, supra note 36, at 5. Legal scholars have also explored the race and gender effects of antimiscegenation laws. See, e.g., Harris, supra note 37, Loving Before and After the Law, at
The construction of Mexican Americans like Andrea Pérez as white reveals this to the extent that, as history suggests, this construction related to the desire of Anglo men to improve their prospects by marrying the daughters of wealthy Mexican landowners, as well as to the formal effects of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hildalgo, which conferred U.S. citizenship on Mexican nationals. One also sees this intersection on the face of early statutory prohibitions on interracial intimacy. Such provisions were "straightforwardly sex-specific." The first statute prohibiting interracial marriage in the United States, enacted by the colony of Maryland in 1664, was plainly gendered, requiring the enslavement of any free white woman who intermarried with a black slave:

Bee it further enacted by the Authority advice and Consent aforesaid That whatsoever free borne woman shall inter marry with any slave from and after the Last day of this present Assembly shall serve the master of such slave during the life of her husband And that all the Issue of such freeborne woemen soe marryed shall be slaves as their fathers were And Bee it further Enacted that all the Issues of English or other freeborne woemen that have already married Negroes shall serve the Masters of their Parents till they be Thirty years of age and noe longer.

Later iterations of Maryland’s antimiscegenation statute were similarly gendered. For example, a 1681 statute prohibited intermarriage between white women servants and black slaves.172 A 1692 statute later expanded the ban of interracial marriage to cover all white women, whether free or consigned to indentured servitude, and free Blacks, as well as slaves.173

As many scholars have noted, provisions such as these early statutes were first and foremost about property and race.174 Linking slave status to blackness, as these statutes ultimately did,175 secured a steady stream of labor for white planters.176 But women were also central to the development of the slave system. Maternal identity—black and white in early years—became a critical determinant for servitude, as a 1662 matrilineal servitude statute enacted in Virginia makes very plain.177 And the behaviors of white women in particular

The 1681 Act tried to eliminate incentives for miscegenation that existed under the 1664 statute by providing that white women servants induced by their masters to enter into an interracial marriage would become free instantly and that any children borne to her during this period would also be free. [A]ny free born English or white woman be shee free or Servant and shall hereafter intermarry with any negro or other Slave or any Negro made free, shall immediately upon such marriage forfeit her freedome and become a Servant during the Term of seven years to the use and benefit of the Ministry of the Poor . . . and if he be a free Negro or Slave to whom she intermarried, he shall thereby also forfeit his freedom and become a Servant to the use aforesaid during his naturall life . . . and the issues of such women shall likewise be Servants to the use aforesaid till they arrive at the Age of one and twenty years . . . .

175. See Alpert, supra note 170, at 197.
176. See Martinot, supra note 45, at 88. Indeed, this connection became critical to the operation of the slave system. As the court in Gobu v. Gobu, 1 N.C. 188 (N.C. 1802), explained, Blacks were presumed to be slaves under existing law. As a result, litigation in this area frequently involved individuals trying to disprove their presumptive blackness in order to escape the atrocities of servitude. See Jason A. Gillmer, Suing for Freedom: Interracial Sex, Slave Law, and Racial Identity in the Post-Revolutionary and Antebellum South, 82 N.C. L. REV. 535 (2004); Ariela J. Gross, Litigating Whiteness: Trials of Racial Determination in the Nineteenth-Century South, 108 YALE L.J. 109 (1998).
177. See Martinot, supra note 45, at 88, 90; see also see Hudgins v, Wright, 11 Va. 134 (1806) (holding that presumption of slave status for Blacks could be rebutted by showing that individuals descended from Native Americans or Whites in the maternal line). Martinot explains that the focus on matrilinearity was a departure from “the fundamental English legal principle of patriarchal descent.” Martinot, supra note 45, at 88. He contends that the focus on maternal servitude status was symbolic of a “decision to shift . . . [the colonial] plantation labor force to Africans and move swiftly toward perpetual servitude for Africans.” Id.

Significantly, Virginia’s matrilineal line statute included a ban on interracial sex, though this prohibition applied to both men and women. Id. at 87. It provided in relevant part:
WHEREAS some doubts have arisen whether children got by any Englishman upon a negro woman should be slave or free, Be it therefore enacted and declared by this present grand assembly, that all children borne in this country shall be held bond or free only according to the condition of the mother. And that if any christian shall commit fornication with a negro man or woman, he or she so offending shall pay double the fines imposed by the former act.
Id. at 87-88.
helped to set the parameters for whiteness, cross-racial interactions, and sexual decency.\textsuperscript{178} This last point is borne out by the types of punishments imposed on interracial intimacy in the seventeenth century. As Kopytoff and Higginbotham have emphasized, white women found to have violated norms regarding race and sexuality frequently received more severe punishments than white men accused of similar transgressions.\textsuperscript{179} Similarly, white women bearing children out of wedlock faced steeper sanctions for babies who were mixed-race rather than white: a penalty for crossing racial lines.\textsuperscript{180}

Later state statutory antimiscegenation provisions generally omitted specific references to gender.\textsuperscript{181} But the dual nature of prohibitions on interracial intimacy remained salient throughout the darkest days of slavery and into the post-Civil War period.\textsuperscript{182}

Southern states moved quickly to establish bans on interracial intimacy in the years after the Civil War.\textsuperscript{183} Once it was clear that the Reconstruction amendments and the Civil Rights Act of 1866 would not be a barrier to racial separation in this context,\textsuperscript{184} states adopted new, more stringent prohibitions on interracial marriage,\textsuperscript{185} sometimes imposing multi-year terms of imprisonment as punishment for transgressing racial lines.\textsuperscript{186} A number of legislatures even moved to include antimiscegenation provisions in their state constitutions.\textsuperscript{187}

But see Lenhardt, Understanding the Mark, supra note 18, at 855-56 (discussing incidence of rape of black women by slave masters during this period). Indeed, Gillmer reports that, in the South, only Mississippi, Alabama, South Carolina, and Georgia failed to adopt formal bans on interracial marriage before the Civil War. Gillmer, supra note 176, at 540 n.21. Wallenstein has speculated on this omission in the case of Mississippi, suggesting that such a ban might have been deemed overkill at a time when all Blacks were slaves and, thus, without the legal right to marry. Here again, race was a major concern for lawmakers, but issues of gender were arguably also on their minds. Indeed, what one author described as an "obsessive regard for the sanctity of white women" pervaded legislatures and local communities in the wake of the Civil War.

B. Antimiscegenation Laws and "Gender Role Differentiation"

As the previous section suggests, "[g]ender role differentiation" constituted one of the primary purposes of antimiscegenation laws. In the case of white women, these provisions helped to establish the white woman as the font of racial purity and virtue, a being to be honored, protected, and ultimately controlled at any cost. Desexualized in a way that their black female counterparts were not, the role of white women as mother assumed paramount importance in the social system of the South. Lisa Lindquist Dorr's fascinating account of the history of the Racial Integrity Act enacted by Virginia in the 1920s, which made it an offense for "a white person to marry anyone of another race," emphasizes this reality. Dorr explains that, in the 1920s, "[f]ears about women's new [social] freedoms and changing [domestic] roles converged with eugenic concerns about racial order." She suggests that a desire to keep white women firmly locked into the role of mother and producers of pure white children, and away from black men in particular, informed the legislative debates that led to the passage of the Act.

In setting out parameters for acceptable white womanhood, antimiscegenation laws also worked to construct gender identities for other

If white women were delicate beings free from taint and overt sexuality, black women represented the opposite. They were cast as stereotypical Jezebels: wanton, lascivious temptresses responsible for any unwanted sexual advances thrust upon them. Black men—frequently the target of lynch mobs purporting to avenge a rape or perceived incidence of sexual impropriety—became constructed as beings of superhuman strength, so oversexed and obsessed with white women that they had to be restrained and controlled at all costs; above all, they had to be prevented in every way from achieving a degree of romantic intimacy with white women. The remarkable story of African American 20th Century boxing sensation Jack Johnson exemplifies the staying power of this construction. As recalled in an essay by Rachel Moran, Johnson was frequently criticized for engaging in sometimes very public sexual liaisons with white women, but “was most severely condemned" and ultimately convicted of violating the Mann Act for marrying one of them.

In the race and gender hierarchy erected by antimiscegenation laws, only white males fared well. Cast as gentle and honorable, they possessed and exercised full dominion and power over all others. Further, they enjoyed a sexual freedom denied to white women, as well as Blacks. Violations of bans on interracial sex by white males—especially those involving the rape of black women they enslaved—were regularly overlooked and, where noticed, were often justified as the inevitable result of exposure to the sexual powers of black women.\textsuperscript{204} In other words, as one scholar put it, "‘white men turned a convenient ideological somersault to justify their own access to and violation of black women while furiously denouncing sex between black men and white women on the grounds of racial purity.’\textsuperscript{205}

The effectiveness of interracial marriage bans in erecting gender hierarchies is also evident outside the plain text of antimiscegenation statutes or the debates surrounding them.\textsuperscript{206} Historian Peggy Pascoe points to two useful examples.\textsuperscript{207} The first concerns the results of a sociological survey involving interracial couples in the 1920s.\textsuperscript{208} Pascoe notes that the survey responses suggested that "individual men and women’s decisions to cross racial boundary lines were very often rooted in conceptions of gender relations" as well as race—for example, notions about which racial group’s members were likely to be the best providers or the best homemakers.\textsuperscript{209} To illustrate this point, Pascoe quotes an interview in which a Hawaiian woman explained the high rate of interracial marriage among women of her ethnic group: ‘‘The Hawaiian men,’ she said, ‘are not steady workers and good providers. The Chinese men are good to provide, but they are stingy. The white men are good providers and they give their wives more money.’\textsuperscript{210}

Pascoe’s second example concerns judicial proceedings stemming from the enforcement of interracial marriage bans, a body of cases legal scholars have begun to explore.\textsuperscript{211} In suits for divorce, annulment, or in will contests, it was not uncommon for one party to allege that one spouse allegedly misrepresented her racial identity and had therefore induced her unwitting partner to enter into an illegal marriage.\textsuperscript{212} Such suits invariably pitted women of color accused of hiding their race against “their white opponents for control of white men’s estates[.] 213

In re Monks Estate exemplifies such a suit. 214 The case, decided seven years before Perez, concerned the estate of Allan Bradford Monks, a wealthy white man, and Monk’s marriage to Antoinette Giraudo. It was alleged that Mrs. Monks had both taken advantage of and defrauded her fragile husband, who had been committed to an institution for the mentally ill for five of the seven years preceding his death. 215 The party alleged that her marriage to Monks, which had taken place in Arizona, was invalid because she was African American, not a “French countess” as she had allegedly told her husband. 216

The Californian trial court—despite proceedings in his which Monks submitted her fingernails and heels to an anthropologist for evaluation 217—found these allegations persuasive, 218 concluding that Antoinette Giraudo Monks was “seven-eighths Caucasian blood and one-eighth Negro blood,” 219 and that her marriage was thus void. It therefore held that the will Mr. Monks executed to benefit his wife in 1930 was without force and could not supplant an earlier will he drafted. 220

On appeal, Mrs. Monks objected to the lower court’s conclusion that “she was of Negro descent, but contend[ed] that even if such [a] finding [was] . . . supported by credible evidence, . . . the Arizona miscegenation statute [that applied was] . . . unconstitutional as imposing an absolute prohibition against marriage upon any person of mixed Negro and Caucasian blood.” 221 She also argued that nothing in the record established that her husband had, in fact, been white, a prerequisite to voiding the marriage under the applicable law. 222 Nevertheless, the appellate court upheld the trial

221. Id. at 172. Essentially, Antoinette Monks argued that, because the trial court determined that she was 7/8 white and 1/8 black—e.g., both “Negro” and “Caucasian”—that the Arizona statute at issue could be read to “prohibit[ed] her from contracting any valid marriage in Arizona.” Id. at 172-73. In advancing this claim, Antoinette hit upon a concern that Justice Traynor articulated in the vagueness portion of his majority opinion. See Perez v. Sharp, 198 P.2d 17, 28 (Cal. 1948). He too was concerned about the treatment of mixed-race individuals under antimiscegenation laws. Id. Antoinette Monk’s decision to contest her designation as “Negro” stands in stark contrast to the strategy employed by Alice Rhinelander in successfully challenging her white husband’s attempt to annul their marriage on the grounds of her African American heritage. Angela Onwuachi-Willig, in her excellent treatment of the case, explains that Alice Rhinelander argued that her husband “Leonard had known of her ‘colored’ background before marriage, as evidenced by his seeing her naked body during their premarital, sexual affairs and his close relationships with her family, including her mixed-race father and her clearly colored brother-in-law.” Onwuachi-Willig, supra note 37 at 2399-400.
222. Similar questions had been raised about husbands in other cases. Pascoe cites the example of the Arizona case of Kirby v. Kirby, 206 P. 405 (Ariz. 1922). Pascoe, Miscegenation Law, supra note 2, at 44-52. Joe Kirby secured an annulment of his marriage to his wife Mayellen court's conclusions regarding fraud and rejected the "interesting" issue of race raised by Mrs. Monks as not directly presented by the case.223

While we can surmise only so much from this one example, the resolution of In re Monks Estate tracks the pattern of disenfranchising women of color identified by Pascoe.224 At the end of her case, Antoinette was left with neither an estate nor any formal link to the man she had called her husband. Further, the opinion highlights in at least one other respect the extent to which the antimiscegenation context served as an important site for the maintenance of gender-based hierarchies.225 Assuming the veracity of the court's conclusion that Antoinette Monks engaged in racial misrepresentation, it seems clear that she "passed" not only to avoid the restrictions imposed on her because of race, but to circumvent those imposed by gender. By marrying her husband, Antoinette arguably took on the persona of a pure, respectable woman in a way that would have been unattainable had she revealed as a black, female identity. This is evident in the language the court used to discuss the case once it believed it has uncovered Antoinette's "true" identity. It was full of disdain for on grounds that she had "negro" blood, but only after questions arose and testimony was given on his own racial lineage. Id. Kirby's mother was cross-examined on the question whether her "Mexican" background included Native American ancestors. Id. at 45. And Mayellen Kirby's attorneys argued that her husband Joe looked "Indian." Id. at 51. Sounding a note that resonates with the county clerk's actions in Perez, the trial court declined to consider questions of appearance, explaining that "Mexicans are classed as of the Caucasian race. They are descendants, supposed to be, of the Spanish conquerors of that country, and unless it can be shown that they are mixed up with some other races, why the presumption is that they are descendants of the Caucasian race." Id. at 51 (citation omitted).

224. See Pascoe, Race, Gender, and Intercultural Relations, supra note 36, at 8. I am not aware of any complete survey of cases in this area. Randall Kennedy notes that not all such suits resulted in disenfranchisement for women. See Kennedy, supra note 3, at 236-241 (expressing the view that judges were sometimes sympathetic to the situation of women in such contexts); see also id. (discussing Dillon v. Dillon, 60 Ga. 204 (1910) and Ferrall v. Ferrall, 69 S.E. 60 (N.C. 1910), two cases in which state courts had, on grounds of fairness, rejected suits for divorce by husbands who claimed that their wives had, unbeknownst to them, misrepresented their racial identity).
225. See Pascoe, Race, Gender, and Intercultural Relations, supra note 36, at 8. I am grateful to Professor June Carbone for encouraging me to consider the decision in Borelli v. Brusseau, 16 Cal. Rptr. 2d 16 (Cal. Ct. App. 1993), a California case in which a court rejected a wife's attempts to enforce against her husband's estate an oral promise he made to convey property to her in exchange for her oral promise to care for him following a stroke, concluding, inter alia, that the promises made by the wife, who had earlier executed a prenuptial agreement with her husband, concerned obligations she already had to care for her husband. See Martha M. Ertman, Legal Tenderness: Feminist Perspectives on Contract Law, 18 Yale J.L. & Feminism 545, 567-70 (2006). The reading of Borelli that suggests its holding might be explained by judicial concerns about women taking advantage of husbands whom they wed relatively late in life might also apply to aspects of In re Monks Estate. See Email from June Carbone, Professor of Law, University of Missouri-Kansas City School of Law, to R.A. Lenhardt, Associate Professor of Law, Fordham Law School (January 1, 2008) (on file with author). Given the substantial discussion of race during the In re Monks Estate trial and in the court's opinion in that case, however, my sense is that concerns about race and the efforts of Antoinette Monks to subvert her place as a black woman in society were at least as, and likely more, germane to the outcome in the case.

In my view, this and other similar evidence of genderization, coupled with the statutory history just discussed, suggests that meaningful parallels between antimiscegenation laws and current restrictions on same-sex marriage can be drawn.^^227 Though operationalized—either implicitly or overtly^^228—through a focus on biological sex, current restrictions on marriage for same-sex couples are, in fact, concerned with the preservation of gender, socially constructed norms about the roles that men and women should carry out in society.^^229 The sex-specific roles of bride and groom send clear messages about "what it means to be a man and what it means to be a woman."^^230 Articulating this argument in a recent online essay, Professor Richard Ford pointed to comments such as

226. In re Monks Estate, 120 P.2d at 174, 176.

228. Congress passed the Defense of Marriage Act in 1996, which explicitly defines marriage as a union between "one man and one woman," 1 U.S.C. § 7 (1996), and provides that no state will have to recognize same-sex marriages executed in another jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C. § 1738C (1996). See also Cooper, supra note 150, at 338. Since then, often in response to Goodridge, scores of states have also moved toward sex-specific definitions of marriage, modifying the language of their marriage statutes, including sex-specific provisions regarding marriage in their constitutions, or passing state-level Defense of Marriage Acts specifically defining marriage as a union between a man and a woman. See Cooper, supra note 150; see also Pascoe, Ugly Rhetoric, supra note 150 (noting that many states moved to take these actions much earlier than Goodridge and suggesting that they did so in reaction to Loving's invalidation of antimiscegenation laws). Even where no sex-specific language is employed, however, marriage statutes have been read essentially to include them. See, e.g., Hernandez v. Robles, 855 N.E.2d 1, 1 (N.Y. 2006).

Note that arguments focusing on biological sex have sometimes been advanced in the same-sex marriage context. See Baehr v. Lewin, 852 P.2d 44, 70 (Haw. 1993) (holding that denial of marriage license to gay couple involved classification on the basis of sex); see also Singer v. Hara, 522 P.2d 1187, 1190-91 (Wash. 1974) (rejecting claim that denial of marriage license to lesbian couple violated state Equal Rights Amendment provision providing that "[e]quality of rights and responsibility under the law shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex"); Baker v. Nelson, 191 N.W.2d 185, 186 (Minn. 1971) (rejecting argument that, inter alia, restricting marriage based on the sex of the couples is "irrational and invidiously discriminatory").

“‘God made marriage for Adam and Eve; not Adam and Steve,’” that frequently surface in debates about same-sex marriage. He suggested that they rest ultimately not on “moral condemnation of same-sex couples but instead on the most primordial account of natural sex difference.” The notion that two men might want to share a life together or to raise children, or that two women could sustain a functioning, happy household without assistance from any man, threatens the perceived social order in much the same way that the prospect of intermarriage between Blacks and Whites did in the past.

IV

THE REGULATION OF IDENTITY IN THE ANTIMISCEGENATION AND SAME-SEX MARRIAGE CONTEXTS

Proponents of the analogy will no doubt find promising the insight that bans on interracial and same-sex marriage have both worked to set norms regarding gender. It could certainly be employed to make the case that the experiences of African Americans and others in the interracial marriage context and gay and lesbian couples in the same-sex marriage context are similar in important ways. Quite apart from some of the analogy-related concerns detailed above, however, the question remains: what does advancing such an analogy accomplish? Does it help to elucidate fully questions about modern marriage or the right of gay and lesbian couples to access it to any appreciable degree? I argue that it does not. If anything, it obfuscates important issues that arise in this context.

The move to analogy seen in popular discussions about marriage rights for same-sex couples relies on a particular reading of the history of race and sexual orientation-based discrimination, but is informed by the Supreme Court’s Fourteenth Amendment analytical structure. Under the Court’s three-tiered analysis, a minority group merits heightened constitutional protection from discrimination only insofar as it can analogize its characteristics or claims to those already addressed by an established tier. The answers to these formalistic inquiries drive the court’s analysis, setting, as advocates’ arguments about the breadth of the right recognized in Loving imply, the level of generality at which a group’s rights are conceptualized and the degree of scrutiny that will be applied.

Legal scholars have criticized the court’s analysis for its “rigidity” and “internal inconsistency” because, while it highlights certain issues, it obscures many other important issues from view. In particular, the focus on matching group experiences means that the precise nature of the government policy or practice at issue often remains insufficiently explored, particularly if the policy affects a group which is only due rational basis review.

Karlan, supra at 1457. In other words, she contends that the question of gay and lesbian rights does not fit nicely into the tiered analysis the Supreme Court applies in Equal Protection and Due Process cases, a fact underscored by Lawrence and Romer, as they are both instances in which the Court departed from the rational basis review typically applied when no suspect class or fundamental right is at stake. Id. at 1450.

236. The first issue of course bears on the extent to which a particular group might be regarded as a suspect class for Equal Protection purposes. See id. at 1460; see also Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 519 (1980) (Marshall, J., concurring in judgment) (discussing race and factors relevant to suspect classification). The second goes to the question whether a right that might properly be characterized as fundamental is at stake in the Due Process context. See Karlan, supra note 235, at 1450; see also Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464, 470 (1977) (discussing fundamental rights and the application of strict scrutiny). In both instances, affirmative answers to these questions would require the application of heightened scrutiny. See Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 357 (Brennan, J., concurring in judgment and dissenting in part)

Unquestionably, we have held that a government practice or statute which restricts ‘fundamental rights’ or which contains ‘suspect classifications’ is to be subject to ‘strict scrutiny’ and can be justified only if it furthers a compelling government purpose and, even then, only if no less restrictive an alternative is available.

237. See supra at 863-65.

238. See supra note 213.

239. Id.

These concerns have paved the way for a host of proposed alternative frameworks relying on a single standard of constitutional evaluation. See, e.g., Goldberg, supra, at 491-92 (advocating a “proposed single standard [that] consists of three inquiries that emerge from the Equal Protection Clause’s fundamental opposition to laws distinguishing between classes for no legitimate purpose”) (citations omitted); Shaman, supra, at 183 (advocating the adoption of a “unified system of judicial review”).

241. This is especially true when—as here, to the extent that gay men and lesbians are unlikely to be treated as a suspect class and many jurists would regard the policy employed by
In the sections that follow, I argue that, rather than merely preserving the essential character of traditional marriage as typically alleged, identity-based restrictions on marriage—whether race or gender-based—have served primarily to police and restrain expressions of identity and, ultimately, the range of possibilities for human intimacy. Section A builds upon the insight that race and gender are both implicated in anti-miscegenation laws and explores the role that state and local officials have played in the policing of race and gender identity in the United States. Section B then moves to examine the tangible effects of identity policing of this sort on the standing of gay men and lesbians in the United States. Using Perez as a starting point, Section B begins by asking what the right to marry means in our current context, when marriage no longer serves as the primary vehicle for childrearing, sex, or intimacy. It then considers the implications, post-Lawrence, of being excluded from civil marriage because of the state’s interest in preserving certain identity roles or categories. I argue that casting state regulation in this area as identity policing helps to clarify the extent to which gender-based restrictions on marriage adversely affect the citizenship rights of gay men and lesbians and impair their ability to achieve full “belonging” in the broader community.

states in administering marriage laws a “neutral” with respect to categories like race or gender—the level of scrutiny a court is likely to apply is relatively low, and as a result, a fair amount of deference will be accorded government actors. See Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, 473 U.S. 432, 440 (1985).

The general rule is that legislation is presumed to be valid and will be sustained if the classification drawn by the statute is rationally related to a legitimate state interest. When social or economic legislation is at issue, the Equal Protection Clause allows the States wide latitude, and the Constitution presumes that even improvident decisions will eventually be rectified by democratic processes. The general rule gives way, however, when a statute classifies by race, alienage, or national origin. (citations omitted). This said, the Court has been willing to apply a “more searching form of rational basis review” in recent cases involving gay rights. Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 580 (2003); see also Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620, 632 (1996) (holding that the law at issue could not have served a legitimate state interest, and could only be rationalized as animus towards the targeted class); Hunter, Sexual Orientation, supra note 233, at 1551.

245. See Karst, Belonging, supra note 39. Kenneth Karst has argued that “belonging” constitutes an integral part of equal citizenship. Id. at 3. In this article, I am focused on a conception of citizenship that primarily emphasizes inclusion and social acceptance rather than, for example, one focused on one’s relationship to the nation state. And, in that connection, my assessment of the harms that flow from marriage exclusion are not necessarily limited to those who are formal citizens. See Jennifer Gordon and R.A. Lenhardt, Rethinking Work and Citizenship, 55 UCLA L. Rev. 1161 (forthcoming June 2008) (discussing conception of citizenship or belonging not limited to formal citizens). For a discussion of the dimensions of
A. Marriage Regulation as Identity Policing

Feminist scholars have been especially attuned to the historic role of civil marriage in establishing gender roles and delineating men's and women's "rights and responsibilities in the polity."\(^\text{246}\) The extent to which the common law constructed women as subservient, without a legal identity of their own and obligated to provide "husband[s] domestic service, sexual access, affection, companionship, and care,"\(^\text{247}\) and portrayed men as dominant, owing "support and protection" to their wives, but also imbued with "the right to chastise [them] moderately (physically punish) . . . for misbehavior"\(^\text{248}\) has been well-documented.\(^\text{249}\) Just as important as this setting of social norms, however, is the extent to which state regulations have also served over time to reproduce and police identity norms in the marriage context. By identity policing, I mean something more than the mere articulation of a code of behavior or a preference for a particular group or physical characteristic. Instead, I refer to the active attempt on the part of the state to monitor, maintain, and manipulate identity, to patrol its borders in much the same way a police officer might guard a jurisdictional boundary or keep watch for an intruder.

In both the antimiscegenation law and same-sex marriage ban contexts,\(^\text{250}\) identity policing of this sort has served primarily to demonstrate that, as one scholar put it, "there are just 'two kinds'"—for example, two races, black and white,\(^\text{252}\) and two genders, male and female.\(^\text{253}\) Eva Saks helped to explain... the perceived need for preserving these separate categories—grounded in notions of white supremacy and white patriarchy, respectively—in employing the following quote:

'The same law which forbids consanguineous amalgamation forbids ethnical amalgamation. Both are incestuous. Amalgamation is incest.' The taboo of too different (amalgamation/miscegenation) is interchangeable with the taboo of too similar (incest), since both crimes rely on a pair of bodies which are mutually constitutive of each other's deviance, a pair of bodies in which each body is the signifier of the deviance of the other. Neither body can represent the norm, because each is figured as deviance from an other. (This complex of anxiety and taboo also evokes the jurisprudence of sodomy, another area of the law in which a pair of bodies constitutes deviance upon conjunction. Because they are too similar to each other, and to different from the 'norm,' the bodies of sodomy are legally Other.)

Historically, identity policing in these contexts seeks to resist or ignore any instability in the socially constructed categories of race and gender. Consider the country clerk's insistence in Perez that Andrea be treated as white for the purposes of California's antimiscegenation statute. Also, such regulation attempts to suppress difference and individual expressions of selfhood to maintain the integrity of identity categories that are thought necessary to sustain the existing social order. The failure of many antimiscegenation statutes to take account of the existence and experience of so-called mixed-race individuals is illustrative. In the case of both race and sexual orientation, the fear is that "[m]arriage between [the relevant groups] could . . . destabilize the cultural meaning of marriage," rendering it an institution unrecognizable from what it has traditionally been.

The kind of identity policing agenda just described requires more than a mere statute or other similar statement of policy. It also requires people on the ground to enforce the boundaries, with a mandate to identify and resolve quickly any threats to the established norms. Here, the county clerks states like California, antimiscegenation statutes meant to prohibit interracial marriage by a variety of groups, African Americans, as well as individuals of Chinese, Japanese, and Filipino descent. In such circumstances, the incorporation of a range of racial groups was still designed to create "two kinds"—white and non-white. See Deenesh Sohoni, Unsuitable Suitors: Antimiscegenation Laws and the Construction of Asian American Identities, 41 LAW & SOC’Y REV. 587, 612 (2007).

responsible for the fairly mundane task of issuing marriage licenses have been essential. In the antimiscegenation context, county clerks served as the first line of defense against the possible erosion of racial lines. Their role was critical. Interracial marriage was seen as the ultimate offense, far worse than mere sex between the races.

As a result, clerks wielded significant authority for making on-the-spot determinations about the racial background of those seeking applications. They did so according to what some have referred to as a "sixth sense," and they made their decisions pursuant to any criteria they deemed relevant, such as skin color or hair texture. The clerk who declared Andrea Pérez white for the purposes of California’s law explained, "I don’t just sit here and look at people and say, ‘You’re white,’ or ‘You’re Negro.’ . . . I took time to study these things."

County clerks have served a similar role in the same-sex marriage context. Before Richard John Baker and James Michael McConnell became litigants in the first case seeking marriage rights for same-sex couples brought in the United States, they “made application to . . . Gerald R. Nelson, clerk of Hennepin County District Court, for a marriage license,” in accordance with state law. Nelson’s denial of a license to that couple foreshadowed the extent to which county clerks would again be thrust into the vanguard of efforts to reinforce identity categories.

259. See Pascoe, Ugly Rhetoric, supra note 150. Significantly, other bureaucratic officials could also be instrumental in shoring up racial boundary lines. Dorr, Principled Expediency, supra note 107, at 153 (quoting Letter from W.A. Plecker to Mrs. Robert H. Cheatham (April 30, 1924), copy to John Powell, Box 56, JPC)

This is to give you warning that this is a mulatto child and you cannot pass it off as white. A new law passed by the last legislature says that if a child has one drop of negro blood in it, it cannot be counted as white. You will have to do something about this matter and see that the child is not allowed to mix with white children, it cannot go to white schools and can never marry a white person in Virginia.

What is at stake in this context is not the integrity of socially constructed categories of race, but rather the "gendered definitional boundaries of marriage." Indeed, in some of the most public contests around same-sex marriage, county clerks have been absolutely central. As in the race context, these low-level officials, in issuing marriage licenses to same-sex couples, have sometimes been willing to ignore the existence of the categories they have been enlisted to police. For the most part, however, they have strongly resisted any efforts to bend the gender norms on which marriage statutes rely.

Of course, courts have also played an important role in the policing of identity through race and gender-based restrictions on marriage. In the antimiscegenation context, this identity enforcement came in the form of cases involving the direct challenges to antimiscegenation laws or, frequently, in divorces, will contests, or suits for annulment. These proceedings served as a mechanism for both uncovering and effectively punishing individuals who had transgressed racial lines by violating antimiscegenation laws. Courts actively participated in the complex tasks of applying the widely divergent and conflicting rules states had for defining race, and trying to make

268. See Orenstein, supra note 3, at 387.
269. For example, county clerks in Oregon issued approximately 3,000 marriage licenses to gay and lesbian couples. See Li v. State, 110 P.3d 91, 94 (Or. 2005) (holding, inter alia, grant of licenses was without authority). In San Francisco 2004, county clerks, at the behest of the mayor, revised official marriage license applications and certificates in order to permit same-sex couples to marry, an action that paved the way for the California Supreme Court to conclude that same-sex and opposite-sex couples could not be treated differently where full marriage rights are concerned. See In re Marriage Cases, 43 Cal. 4th at 785-87 (discussing procedural events leading to decision on the merits). In that same year, a clerk in Sandoval County, New Mexico granted 66 licenses to gay and lesbian couples seeking to marry before being forced to desist by the state attorney general. See Alan Cooperman, Jonathan Finer, & Fred Barbas, Gay Couples Wed in Mass., WASHINGTON POST, May 17, 2004, at A01, available at http://www.washingtonpost.com/ac2/wp-dyn/A32954-2004May7?language=printer.
270. Indeed, as the Baker case foreshadowed, most of the cases in this context are preceded by the denial of a license by a clerk. Consider the example of Anderson v. King County, 138 P.3d 963 (Wash. 2006), a case that ultimately held that the Washington Defense of Marriage statute did not violate the state constitution. As one newspaper account explains, "[t]he couples took turns walking up to the license counter, where they announced their names and requested a marriage license. To each couple a clerk responded, 'The state law prevents us from issuing you a license.'" In his majority opinion in Perez, Justice Traynor recognized these undertakings as vague and necessarily arbitrary. In many cases, this definitional task required a court to hear testimony and consider circumstantial evidence of a party's race. Recall the In re Monks Estate trial court's determination that Antoinette Monks was 7/8 white and 1/8 black. In reaching this conclusion, the court heard testimony from an anthropologist, who "testified that in his opinion [Antoinette Monks] 'was at least one-eighth Negroid;" a physician "who had had much experience in the southern states and in Africa in his profession," who confirmed this assessment on the basis of his own opinion; and from a beauty parlor operator who allegedly provided Mrs. Monks with clandestine, after-hours service and contended that she was able to divine Mrs. Monks' African American heritage by looking at "the palms of her hands and her fingernails."
For courts in the same-sex marriage context, the policing of gender has involved pronouncements about the essential nature and function of marriage more often than the actual interrogation of bodies. The language employed by the Minnesota Supreme Court in Baker v. Nelson is both representative and instructive:

The institution of marriage as a union of man and woman, uniquely involving the procreation and rearing of children within a family, is as old as the book of Genesis. Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, which invalidated Oklahoma’s Habitual Criminal Sterilization Act on equal protection grounds, stated in part: “Marriage and procreation are fundamental to the very existence and survival of the race.” This historic institution manifestly is more deeply founded than the asserted contemporary concept of marriage and societal interests for which petitioners contend.

Even so, there have been occasions in which courts have engaged in the same sort of identity-scrutinizing and disenfranchising behavior evinced in In re Monks Estate. Take the example of cases involving transgendered people asserting claims based on marriage relationships. Littleton v. Prange did not challenge prohibitions on individuals of the same biological sex from marrying

279. Feminist scholars have urged that limitations on marriage for same-sex couples reinforce stereotypes about women and men in their respective roles within marriages and other intimate relationships. Hara, 522 P.2d 1187, 1191 (Wash. 1974) (referring to Loving and Perez and holding that “[t]he operative distinction lies in the relationship which is described by the term ‘marriage’ itself, and that relationship is the legal union of one man and one woman”).

Anonymous, 325 N.Y.S.2d 499, 500 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1971) (rejecting the contention that a wedding ceremony involving a transsexual could be regarded as a legal marriage because “[t]he law makes no provision for a ‘marriage’ between persons of the same sex. Marriage is and always has been a contract between a man and a woman.”). But see In re M.T. v. J.T., 355 A.2d 204 (N.J. 1976) (holding that post-operative transsexual wife could recover spousal support and maintenance from her husband). Kenneth Karst has also highlighted judicial efforts to determine sexual orientation for various purposes, including compliance with military rules prohibiting expressions of gay identity. See, e.g., Karst, Myths of Identity, supra note 271, at 276-78. Loss of consortium cases involving same-sex couples provide other examples. See John G. Culhane, A Clanging Silence: Same-Sex Couples and Tort Law, 89 Ky. L.J. 911 (2000-2001).
Rather, like the annulment cases and will contests discussed earlier, it implicated state policy regarding gender identity and marriage more indirectly. In Littleton, Christie Littleton, a post-operative transsexual female, filed a medical malpractice suit following the death of her husband, Jonathon Mark Littleton, to whom she had been married for seven years. The question presented was whether, as a person born a biological male, Christie Littleton, whom her doctors regarded as medically female, could properly be regarded as a spouse for the purposes of the Texas Wrongful Death and Survival Statute. After considering medical evidence and Christie’s particular history, among other things, the appellate court concluded that the answer was no, affirming the trial court’s grant of summary judgment in the case. It held that “as a matter of law, Christie Littleton is a male. As a male, Christie cannot be married to another male. Her marriage to Jonathon was invalid, and she cannot bring a cause of action as his surviving spouse.”

In both the antimiscegenation and same-sex marriage contexts the immediate goal of identity policing on the part of county clerks and courts has been to preserve “two kinds” by invalidating individual expressions that might threaten race or gender norms. Interestingly, the overall aim of such policing has been to shape and limit the expression of human intimacy generally, to determine who can safely be loved and who is too socially “spoiled” to be the object of anyone’s affection. In many ways, marriage threatens to undermine the legitimacy of rigid identity categories more than any other phenomenon. As one scholar of antimiscegenation laws explained, “ban[s] on interracial marriage [were] an attempt to censor—to make all but unspeakable—a desire not for sex, but for marriage precisely because marital intimacy posed a more profound challenge to the racial order.” Similarly, marriage bans are integral to the demonization of gay and lesbian intimacy and the strength of the social taboos in this area. Opponents of same-sex marriage fear that, in a universe in which Lawrence v. Texas has already decriminalized gay and lesbian sex, the removal of gender-based restrictions on marriage will lay bare once and for all the humanity of gay and lesbian couples, normalizing what has long been a stigmatized identity. This fear parallels the way in which Loving helped make interracial relationships more socially acceptable. In a sense, our legal regime's recognition of a romantic union has "bec[o]me the discernible mark or seal to authenticate a domain of pure humanity."

B. The Citizenship Implications of Marriage Restrictions on Same-Sex Couples

As scholars have noted, "[m]arriage law [has been] a primary site for the production of normative citizenship" in the United States. Thus, in policing identity in the ways described above, the states, in many ways, can be understood to be engaged in a process of determining who is and who is not a good citizen, who should and should not be welcomed as a full and constituent part of the broader community. As a historical matter, conformity with race and gender norms in marriage has been a prerequisite to inclusion. In the pages that follow, I continue to focus on state governments and the legitimacy and effects of their denial of marriage rights to gay and lesbian couples. First, however, I turn to a question advocates have sought to address in employing Perez in recent marriage litigation: what is the meaning of the right to marry in our current context? What does it mean for the individuals who seek to marry? In considering this issue and how Perez helps to explicate it, we gain a better vantage point from which to assess the effects of identity policing on gay and lesbian couples seeking to marry in a post-Lawrence context.

1. Perez and the Meaning of the Right to Marry

When Sylvester Davis and Andrea Pérez decided to challenge the refusal of the county clerk to grant them a marriage license, they had in mind very particular ideas about what it would mean to marry. They were not, for example, merely looking for sexual intimacy. As I indicated at the outset of this article, neither of them wanted simply to cohabitate, an option that was fully available to them since California’s antimiscegenation law proscribed only interracial marriage, not sex.\footnote{297} They wanted marriage, something the U.S. Supreme Court has described as “the most important relation in life”\footnote{298} and “an association that promotes a way of life not causes; a harmony in living, not political faiths; a bilateral loyalty, not commercial or social projects . . . an association for as noble a purpose as any . . . ”\footnote{299} But they also sought to marry in a way that honored not just their religious beliefs as Catholics, but also their aspirations as members of the community. A religious ceremony without state sanction would have been unappealing. Receiving the sacrament of marriage in their home church\footnote{300} and in their home state was the goal.\footnote{301} For them, marriage clearly served, in part, as a vehicle for gaining civic membership.\footnote{302} The conception of marriage to which Sylvester and Andrea subscribed in 1948, however, was arguably very different from ideas about marriage today.\footnote{303} As Rachel Moran reminds us in a recent article commemorating the fortieth anniversary of Loving, marriage has changed dramatically over the years.\footnote{304} Whereas marriage, as the U.S Supreme Court’s decision in Zablocki v. Redhail intimates,\footnote{305} used to be the primary site for sexual intimacy, procreation, parenting, and economic well-being,\footnote{306} it no longer holds this exalted position in our society.\footnote{307} Premarital sex no longer carries the stigma it did when

301. This helps to explain why the couple was also unwilling to travel to a sister state to marry, as some couples looking to circumvent antimiscegenation laws sometimes chose to do. Orenstein, supra note 3, at 386.

305. See Sunstein, Liberty After Lawrence, supra note 150, at 1071.
307. See Moran, Loving and the Legacy, supra note 147, at 369. It bears noting that gender roles within marriage have also changed a great deal. While the incidence of domestic violence within marriage, see, e.g., Shannon Selden, The Practice of Domestic Violence, 12 U.C.L.A. WOMEN’S L.J. 1 (2001), among other things, certainly suggests that married women may not yet be entirely free of the subjugated role prescribed for them at common law, we have come a long Sylvester and Andrea were dating. Nor, for example, do out-of-wedlock births. Indeed, more and more women, in particular, are raising children outside of the structure of a marital relationship. Likewise, more people than ever before are choosing to divorce or never to marry at all. "Marriage accounted for 84 percent of households" in 1930, but just "49.7 percent of American households" in 2006.

In advancing claims for access to marriage, advocates for same-sex couples must and do rely on the Court's landmark decision in Loving. But, as the move toward deploying Perez in challenges suggests, there are ways in which the Court's decision in Loving fails to offer useful insights into the contemporary meaning of civil marriage. Of course, the Warren Court likely never dreamt for a moment that its judgment would be used to support claims for same-sex couples to marry. As it is, it took them years to be willing to decide that race-based restrictions within different-sex marriage were unconstitutional. Even more than this, though, Warren's opinion in that case is devoid of a real discussion of the place marriage has in society. Consistent with the embrace of color-blindness started in Hirabayashi v. United States and Korematsu v. United States, the Court's thoughts on race and equal protection are most prominent in the opinion. A rejection of a white supremacist agenda and deep concerns about racial classifications emerge most way from the day when Justice Bradley, concurring in the Supreme Court's rejection of Myra Bradwell's challenge to her exclusion from the Illinois bar on grounds of gender, maintained that "[t]he paramount destiny and mission of a woman are to fulfill the noble and benign offices of wife and mother." readily from a review of the decision in Loving.

Obviously, the Court’s acknowledgement that “[m]arriage is one of the ‘basic civil rights of man’” cannot be overlooked. The majority clearly meant the Due Process Clause to be one of the legs on which Loving rested. But, at the same time, the Court’s conclusion on this point cannot be easily discerned.

Chief Justice Warren talked about “the freedom of choice to marry,” but omitted discussions of due process that had appeared in early drafts of his decision. All that can be said for certain is that the Court, at a minimum, endorsed a fairly traditional understanding of marriage and meant to reject race-based obstacles to its enjoyment.

Advocates’ implicit suggestion that Justice Traynor’s majority opinion in Perez has more to offer on the question of what marriage means today has merit. Admittedly, as Moran notes, it is no more likely that Traynor wrote his Perez opinion with same-sex couples in mind than it is that the Loving Court thought about the Goodridge plaintiffs when it liberated Mildred and Richard Loving from their forced exile from their native Virginia. Still, Traynor offers an account of marriage and the problems inherent in identity-based restrictions on it that resonates today. In contrast to Loving, both the equal protection and due process dimensions of Perez are fairly well developed.

Traynor’s discussion of social science research on race and contention that “[h]uman beings are bereft of worth and dignity by a doctrine that would make them as interchangeable as trains” go directly to matters of equality and caste, rejecting the easy formalism of Pace. But they also speak the to significance of marriage and the decision to enter into it.

In refusing to conceive of marriage as something akin to trains or other facilities permitted to be racially segregated by law in 1948, Traynor recognized the extent to which marriage—in spite of the state gatekeeping function it has performed—is special, a mechanism for cementing an intimate, human association. His opinion acknowledges the fundamental dignity and humanity of Andrea and Sylvester, as well as the expressive content inherent in selecting—through a state-sponsored system—the “person of one’s choice” as a life partner. In this sense, Perez is very much in line with the Court’s decision in Turner v. Safely, which, in holding that prison regulations prohibiting inmates to marry in the absence of an official determination that compelling reasons for the marriage existed were unconstitutional, recognized marriages as “expressions of emotional support and public commitment.” It is also arguably in line with the Court’s decision in Lawrence v. Texas. While Lawrence concerned criminal prohibitions on gay sex that reached into the private sphere, not marriage per se, many scholars have read it to be more about human “dignity and equal respect for people involved in intimate relationships,” whether they be private or public.

Perez helps give content to “the freedom to marry” in the twenty-first Century; it sheds light on the public and private dimensions of modern marriage and the citizenship or public standing that marriage confers.

While it is undoubtedly true that we live in an age of intimacy-related "consumerism," it is not yet the case that choosing to marry no longer has social or cultural significance. If nothing else, as Moran notes, it "remains far and away the single most important way in which the government recognizes and supports intimate relationships." Whatever one thinks of the institution of marriage or the state's role in it, the choice to marry still means something, perhaps even more today than it did sixty years ago, when Andrea and Sylvester won the right to wed, because people—given the many other viable options for organizing one's intimate life now available—no longer have to marry to lead fulfilling, economically stable lives. Indeed, as Perez underscores, it may well be in the choosing—whether it occurs for love, as in Andrea and Sylvester's case, or more practical reasons—that an individual asserts his or her individual autonomy, needs, hopes, and desires.

Deciding to marry also conveys a message about the particular relationship being formalized. For many, marriage is "the authentic marker of a serious and committed love relationship; a symbolic rite of passage into adulthood." Even where this is not the case, though, getting married communicates something about how an individual and his or her relationship should be legally, socially, and politically regarded. For better or worse, it says something about where people stand in the community.

2. Identity-Policing and Constraints on Belonging

Queer theorists have bemoaned the emphasis increasingly placed on securing marriage for same-sex couples within the gay and lesbian community. For example, Katherine Franke has argued that "[w]hat we are witnessing in the gay community . . . is a radical substitution or transformation of the nature of homosexual desire. Into the psychic space created by decriminalization [of homosexual intimacy under Lawrence] has rushed a desire for governance, a desire for recognition—recognition by legal and state authority. The de jure refusal to all gay people to satisfy this desire has formed the basis of the new civil rights claims made on behalf of 'the community.'\textsuperscript{343} Her concern, shared by others, is that the social inclusion sought by advocates will be contingent upon the domestication and taming of nonnormative sexual identities.\textsuperscript{344} As proof of the price tag she thinks marriage is likely to carry for the LGBT community, Franke points to the experience of newly freedmen and women during Reconstruction.\textsuperscript{345} For these individuals, who had lacked the legal capacity to enter into marriages during slavery, "[t]he right to marry figured prominently among the bundle of rights African Americans held dear in the postbellum years."\textsuperscript{346} Franke notes that legal marriage was understood to be an important vehicle for the realization of black citizenship, but argues that it proved to be a mechanism by which that citizenship was also "managed in African Americans."\textsuperscript{347} Freedpersons were often severely punished for any noncompliance with the social norms and practices attending civil marriage.\textsuperscript{348}

I do not contest the notion that, as a society, we benefit from having a variety of models and alternatives for intimate associations from which individuals can freely choose to express their essential selves.\textsuperscript{349} While civil unions and domestic partnerships adopted by many jurisdictions as an alternative to same-sex marriage have been properly criticized by many,\textsuperscript{350} one might find that, as time goes on, these legal arrangement become a desirable alternative to marriage,\textsuperscript{351} especially if different-sex couples, who already have access to these alternatives in some places, begin to use them in large numbers as a vehicle for obtaining some of the economic benefits states now deliver through civil marriage.\textsuperscript{352} It may be that other alternatives emerge as well. Some have argued, for example, that friendship be accorded legal recognition as a model for human intimacy and commitment.\textsuperscript{353} But the notion that meaningful choice among intimate associations is potentially beneficial begs the question whether it is nevertheless morally and constitutionally problematic for states to remove marriage from the array of choices open to gay men and lesbians.\textsuperscript{354} "[T]he opportunity to establish an officially recognized family with a loved one and to obtain the substantial benefits such a relationship may offer is of the deepest and utmost importance to any individual and couple who wish to make such a choice."\textsuperscript{355} And, given this, I submit that—even at a time when the centrality of marriage as a social institution is greatly diminished\textsuperscript{356}—restrictions on the ability of same-sex couples to select "the person of one's choice" exact a citizenship harm.\textsuperscript{357} As Angela Harris suggests in a recent article, such prohibitions reflect the state's determination that gay men and lesbians cannot properly be included in "who the People will be", in the community of good and acceptable citizens.\textsuperscript{358}

\textsuperscript{354} I would add that, in many ways, including marriage among the intimate choices that gay men and lesbians are permitted to make might make more meaningful, rather than less, the value of the choice not to marry that Franke and others discuss. See \textit{supra} at 156-57. To the extent that "'[q]ueer gets its critical edge by defining itself against the normal,'" rejecting the full option to marry would arguably only intensify the political message communicated by the choice of intimate connections other than marriage queer theorists want to preserve. It is undoubtedly correct that marriage does not do the same citizenship work today that it did for former slaves or for individuals like Sylvester and Andrea in the 1940s, who faced exclusion from certain public parks or facilities, as well as being prevented from marrying across racial lines. Members of the LGBT community today face a different set of constraints. At the same time, in an environment in which consumerism—in the intimacy context or elsewhere—is rampant, it seems clear that a state-imposed limit on one’s ability to choose from amidst the full panoply of alternatives for ordering one’s intimate associations imposes a substantial burden. This is particularly so when the alternative at issue is regarded as one of the “basic civil rights of man.” As the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court explained in Goodridge, “[w]ithout the right to marry – or more properly – the right to choose to marry – one is excluded from the full range of human experience and denied full protection of the laws for one’s ‘avowed commitment to an intimate and lasting human relationship.’

The right to choose one’s intimate associations, as a legal matter, is not unlimited. Government can, for example, regulate relationships that it regards as presumptively exploitative, such as polygamy. Where such a threat is absent, however, government must, at a minimum, articulate a sufficiently rational basis for its actions. In a post-Lawrence world, where prohibitions on same-sex sexual intimacy have been decriminalized, arguments based on tradition or the need to preserve a particular kind of morality are unpersuasive. This is so, I maintain, even though what gay men and lesbians seek here is access to an institution rather than freedom from intrusive government regulation. I agree that Lawrence should be understood as a case in which the Court was concerned with dignity, not evidence of criminalization. The liberty interests in human expression recognized by the Lawrence Court, like those recognized in Perez, are significant. Whatever one thinks of this argument, however, it seems clear that, at a minimum, limitations on marriage for same-sex couples violate important principles of dignity, fairness, and equality of treatment, ones not resolved by the notion that, under applicable law, all individuals, gay or straight, are prohibited from marrying a person of the same sex. They essentially erect a sub-class or caste of citizens whose intimate choices cannot be celebrated or fully recognized by the state.

Particularly where marriage restrictions relating to class status and incarceration have been invalidated, the continued restraint on the ability of gay men and lesbians to choose the "person of one's choice" is highly problematic. Effectively a punishment for non-conformity with norms regarding gender and sexuality, state bans on marriage for gay men and lesbians "represent a rejection of their personal aspirations, the non-recognition of their personhood, and the denial of their dream . . . ." Such bans impose a stigma, communicating the message that gay men and lesbians are not part of us. Ultimately, they work to exclude gay men and lesbians from what Kenneth Karst has described as “belonging,” respect, full acceptance, and equal inclusion in the broader community.

CONCLUSION

This article has sought to untangle and reconcile a number of love stories: one involving Sylvester Davis and Andrea Pérez; another that features advocates fighting for the rights of gay and lesbian couples to marry; and those of all gay and lesbian couples. Despite what Pérez’s non-recognition might ordinarily suggest, this “lost” case has the potential significantly to advance our thinking about race, gender, and marriage.

Pérez certainly helps to explicate some of the parallels that exist between the experiences of people affected by both antimiscegenation and same-sex marriage bans. My goal in this article, however, has been to move conversations about both antimiscegenation laws and limits on same-sex marriage “beyond analogy,” to a place focused less on the extent to which those advancing claims for justice can be fit easily into familiar racial or gender categories than on the nature of the actual injustice at stake.

It may be that not everyone affected by these state bans will experience exclusion from marriage as a personal injury. See Franke, Longing for Loving, supra note 344 (arguing that Lawrence and current period of non-regulation of LGBT intimate relationships should be seen as an opportunity, rather than an injury). This does not, however, diminish the significance of the harm for those who do or address the larger question of whether the government can constitutionally treat individuals in this way.

Elsewhere, I have noted that Pérez could be extremely useful in helping scholars think about cross-racial interactions, not only in the area of romance and intimate relations, but also in terms of political and economic coalition building between African Americans and Latinos on a range of issues, including racial equality, work, education, and immigration. See Lenhardt, The Story of Perez v. Sharp, supra note 3, at 370-71. Current discourse on marriage rights lacks an awareness of the state’s affirmative role in shaping group and individual identity (as well as expressions of human intimacy) through its laws and policies. A close look at the purpose and effects of government identity-policing in both the antimiscegenation and same-sex marriage contexts can lead to productive changes in the debate about the place of marriage in modern society and the citizenship rights of gay men and lesbians. This is particularly true when one considers that the identity-policing the government has carried on in these areas is neither equal nor neutral. Ultimately, it serves as an important tool for separating out the “bad” citizens form the “good,” for placing gay men and lesbians firmly on the margins of society.

The California Supreme Court’s recent, Perez-informed decision in In re Marriage Cases suggests that this harsh reality is becoming more and more difficult to ignore. I am optimistic that this decision also signals that the expansive understanding of marriage and citizenship that I advance in this Article will one day become widely accepted. But, even if this view never carries the day, it is my hope that, at a minimum, the suggestions for reframing the debate about marriage that I offer here will help to pave the way for more open and honest assessments of the true implications and citizenship costs of race and gender-based impediments to the selection of “the person of one’s choice” for marriage.
