THE LEGAL STATUS OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL’S “LIST”

The Deportation and Exclusion Laws of 1917, 1918, and 1920 forbade the admission of alien members of organizations which advocated the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence. Faced with the necessity of deciding which organizations followed this policy, Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer listed 12 organizations, membership in which would automatically lead to exclusion or deportation for alien members. However, the deportation proceedings instituted under the acts aroused such a public clamor that the list, as a standard, was withdrawn.

After the rise of Hitler, the various congressional committees on un-American activities listed organizations deemed dangerous to the United States. With the passage of section 9A of the Hatch Act, which denied federal employment to persons who belonged to groups advocating the violent overthrow of the Government, and the Voorhis Anti-Propaganda Act, requiring the registration with the Attorney General of such groups, the need for a criterion became apparent. This became especially true when a rider to the Department of Justice Appropriations Act was passed giving the Attorney General $100,000 for investigating federal employees who belonged to “subversive” organizations. The Attorney General ruled that “subversive” was to be equated with advocacy of the violent overthrow of the Government and submitted a list of such organizations. President Roosevelt issued Executive Order No. 9300, which set up a committee within the Justice Department to deal with subversive activity of federal employees. Apparently recourse was had to the Attorney General’s list by the committee. This list was not made public in its entirety until 1947.

In 1947 President Truman signed Executive Order No. 9835, which granted to the Attorney General the power to declare organizations subversive after an “appropriate investigation and determination.”

Apparently without notifying any of the organizations involved, the Attorney General then compiled and disseminated a list of the organizations he considered either "totalitarian," "fascist," "communist," "subversive," or "which advocate the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence." Included on this list were groups which had been previously listed as well as other organizations designated for the first time. In the list published in March 1948 all the groups were designated in alphabetical order without any attempt to categorize them in relation to the categories set up in Executive Order No. 9835. In September 1948 a new list was published which labeled 21 groups as "totalitarian," 15 as "fascist," 4 as "having adopted a policy of force and violence to deny others their constitutional rights," 5 as "seeking to alter the form of Government of the United States by unconstitutional means," and 6 as "subversive." Subsequent designations adhered to these labels until August 1953 when without explanation a consolidated list was again published without categorization.

POSITION OF THE LISTED GROUPS

Among the groups first designated in May 1948 was the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee, ostensibly a "charitable organization engaged in relief work." This group brought action for declaratory and injunctive relief against the Attorney General. Relief was ultimately granted by the Supreme Court on the ground that the conduct of the Attorney General was either "patently arbitrary" or a denial of due process. Since the listing of the Committee without a hearing was not a "determination" as required by the Order, the Attorney General was said to have exceeded his authority.

Subsequently Executive Order No. 9835 was repealed, but the power granted to the Attorney General was restated by Executive Order No. 10450 issued by President Eisenhower. Thereafter the Attorney General issued rules of procedure which generally prescribed notice and hearing for groups the Justice Department proposed to designate as subversive. The regulations expressly provided that previous designations were not affected and that they would continue in effect unless the procedures outlined were followed by the groups previously listed. Order No. 9835, Part III (1), 12 Fed. Reg. 1935 (1947), and whose duty it was to review cases involving persons recommended for dismissal on grounds relating to loyalty by the loyalty board of any department or agency and to make advisory recommendations thereon.

procedures require written notice from the organization that it wishes to contest the designation. 30

In 1953 the Attorney General advised the National Lawyers Guild that he proposed to designate the Guild as an organization under the purview of Executive Order No. 10450. 31 The Guild filed for injunctive relief, contending that the Executive Orders 32 were unconstitutional and that the procedural regulations denied the Guild due process of law.

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia 33 questioned some features of the regulations: elimination of oral testimony and cross-examination 34 the complete elimination of evidence in the discretion of the Attorney General 35 and making an "evasive" reply to an interrogatory an "admission" of the facts to which the interrogatory referred. 36 However, Judge Prettyman, speaking for the court, declared that the rules permitted a valid proceeding, including the basic tests of notice and hearing. 37 The court would not speculate in advance as to the details of a proceeding yet to be held and ruled that the Guild was therefore required to exhaust the administrative remedies set forth in the regulations before application for relief to the courts. 38

The court also stated that the decision in Joint Anti-Fascist Committee v. McGrath 39 turned upon the lack of procedural safeguards for the organization designated and that "implicit in [the Supreme Court's] opinion is the premise

If the registered notice is delivered, the organization, within ten days following its receipt or ten days following the effective date of Executive Order No. 10450, whichever shall be later, may file with the Attorney General, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C., a written notice that it desires to contest such designation. If the notice of proposed designation is not delivered and is returned by the Post Office Department, the Attorney General shall cause such notice to be published in the Federal Register, supplemented by such additional notice as the Attorney General may deem appropriate. Within thirty days following such publication in the Federal Register, such organization may file with the Attorney General, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C., a written notice that it desires to contest such designation. Failure to file a notice of contest within such period shall be deemed an acquiescence in such proposed action, and the Attorney General may thereupon after appropriate determination designate such organization and publish such designation in the Federal Register."

that the listings were not invalid for total lack of power in the President and the Attorney General.\textsuperscript{40}

Since the issuance of the procedural rules there has been no court test of a final administrative designation. Whether the application of these rules in a particular case affords due process must await such a final determination and a resultant court test. However, it is important to note that the Attorney General has discontinued the classification of organizations as "totalitarian," "fascist," "communist," etc., and has grouped them alphabetically without reference to any particular category.\textsuperscript{41} The abolition of the distinctions among organizations would seem to curtail the value and efficacy of the list, since many statutes which proscribe membership in certain organizations refer to "subversive"\textsuperscript{42} groups or to groups which "advocate the overthrow of the government by force and violence"\textsuperscript{43} but make no mention of "fascist" groups or of the other categories of organizations which the Attorney General was instructed to designate.\textsuperscript{44}

In spite of the decision in \textit{Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath} in 1951, the Attorney General in April 1953 under the authority of Executive Order No. 10450,\textsuperscript{45} redesignated the organizations which had been previously designated under Executive Order No. 9835.\textsuperscript{46} Since there was no hearing prior to redesignation, the regulations providing for a hearing were of no aid to the groups designated at that time and their status as cited organizations has continued to the present time. Assistant Attorney General William F. Tompkins, in charge of the Internal Security Division, reported that final arrangements had been made in June 1955 for the first hearings under the regulations promulgated in May 1953.\textsuperscript{47} In the meantime, all organizations previously designated have remained on the list.

\textsuperscript{40}National Lawyers Guild v. Brownell, 225 F.2d 552, 556 (D.C. Cir. 1955). There were six opinions in Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U.S. 123 (1951). See text at note 131 infra. The judgment of the Court was announced by Justice Burton with whom Justice Douglas concurred. Justice Burton said, "If, upon the allegations in any of these complaints, it had appeared that the acts of the respondents, from which relief was sought, were authorized by the President under his Executive Order No. 9835, the case would have bristled with Constitutional issues. On that basis the complaint would have raised questions as to the justiciability and merit of claims based upon the First, Fifth, Ninth and Tenth Amendments to the Constitution. It is our obligation, however, not to reach those issues unless the allegations before us squarely present them." 341 U.S. at 135. Justice Black, concurring, said, "Assuming, though I deny, that the Constitution permits the executive officially to determine, list and publicize individuals and groups as traitors and public enemies..." 341 U.S. at 143. Justice Frankfurter also concurring, dealt mainly with the due process issue but did compare the situation to the one which gave rise to the Sedition Act of 1798, 1 Stat. 596 (1798). The remaining concurring opinions of Justices Douglas and Jackson also dealt with the due process issue. The three dissenting Justices (Reed, Minton and Vinson) argued that the President had the power to direct the Attorney General to issue the list and that the procedure did not deny appellants due process of law.

\textsuperscript{41} Compare the list published by the Loyalty Review Board in December 1951, 16 Fed. Reg. 12214 (1951), with the list published by the Attorney General in May 1953, 18 Fed. Reg. 2741 (1953).

without any hearing despite the ruling by the Supreme Court in 1951 that such action was “patently arbitrary.”

Another serious weakness in the compilation of the list is the fact that 117 of the organizations designated in 1953 are defunct and hence cannot protest the designation as provided in the Attorney General’s regulations. As a result they continue on the list and presumably their former members are subject to any sanctions which may be imposed because of membership despite the fact that no hearing was given to the organizations involved.

EFFECT OF MEMBERSHIP IN A LISTED ORGANIZATION

1. Employment

The Federal Employees’ Security Program

At the present time the most publicized impact of the Attorney General’s list would appear to be in the field of federal employment, both as to present employees and to applicants for federal jobs. As stated by Justice Douglas, “A disloyalty trial is the most crucial event in the life of a public servant.”

In Executive Order No. 10450 the heads of all agencies are directed to develop information as to whether the employment or retention of employment in federal service of the person being investigated is clearly consistent with the interests of national security, and that such information shall relate but not be limited to . . . membership in, or affiliation or sympathetic association with any foreign or domestic organization, association, movement, group, or combination of persons which is totalitarian, fascist, communist, or subversive, or which has adopted a policy of advocating or approving the commission of acts of force or violence to deny others their rights under the Constitution of the United States or which seeks to alter the form of Government of the United States by unconstitutional means.

Under this order the Attorney General submits his list to the heads of all agencies of the federal government for their consideration in determining whether the retention in employment of a present or prospective employee is “consistent with the best interests of national security.” The now defunct Loyalty Review Board promulgated regulations which stated that affiliation with any of the organizations on the Attorney General’s list was merely evidence, and that “American ideas of justice do not include guilt by association.” It would appear, however, that past or present membership in one of these groups is sufficient ground for summary suspension of the employee by the head of the department.

54 Id., (8)(a) (5), Part III (3), 12 Fed. Reg. 1935 (1947), directed the Attorney General to designate “. . . each foreign or domestic organization, association, movement, group, or combination of persons which is totalitarian, fascist, communist, or subversive, or which have] adopted a policy of advocating or approving the commission of acts of force or violence to deny others their rights under the Constitution of the United States or which seeks to alter the form of Government of the United States by unconstitutional means.”
56 Yarmolinsky, CASE STUDIES IN PERSONNEL SECURITY, Case Nos. 18, 20, 23, 37, (1955).
A recent study of personnel security cases indicates that at least a substantial portion of the charges against the employee are based upon past membership in or affiliation with listed groups.67

State Programs for Employees

Many states and municipalities have adopted laws and ordinances requiring oaths or affidavits of "loyalty" from public employees. Some of these refer to the Attorney General's list specifically,68 but the majority proscribe past or present membership in "subversive" organizations.69 There is considerable evidence that the list is being used as a guide for the definition of "subversive organization" by officials charged with administering the various state programs.60

In Arizona employees of state and county welfare boards will be paid salaries only when they sign an affidavit stating that they are not now and have not been for the past three years a member of any organization on the Attorney General's List.61 A Louisiana statute provides that no person may hold any non-elective position in the government of the state or any political subdivision thereof where the evidence shows such person to be a "knowing member" of an organization listed by the United States Department of Justice.62 Newark, New Jersey,63 and New York City64 as well as the state of New York65 have passed "loyalty oath" requirements for teachers and other public employees which contain questions concerning such membership.66

In Wieman v. Updegraff67 a unanimous Supreme Court struck down an Oklahoma statute which required the signing by state employees of an affidavit of non-membership for the past five years in any organization designated by the Attorney General.68 In this case the Court held that denial of employment on the basis of mere past or present membership in an organization without knowledge of its subversive objectives "must fall as an assertion of arbitrary power."69

However, Adler v. Board of Education\textsuperscript{70} and Gerende v. Board of Supervisors of Elections\textsuperscript{71} had previously upheld loyalty oaths with similar provisions required of school teachers and candidates for public office. In Wieman, the court distinguished these cases by stating that the oaths required in Adler and Gerende implied knowledge on the part of the teacher or candidate of the character and objectives of the organization.

The statutes in Adler and Gerende proscribe past or present membership in subversive organizations. Hence, any use of the Attorney General's list by state officials in administering these or similar programs can be criticized on two grounds. First, since the Attorney General’s list is no longer broken down into the original categories, in order to determine what each organization stands for, a new investigation by the official using the list is required. Secondly, aside from the foregoing objection, since the Attorney General’s original action in listing the groups was either “patently arbitrary” or a denial of due process,\textsuperscript{72} and since as to organizations previously listed all that was done was to relist them without any hearing, the list is of doubtful validity at least as to those organizations.

The Industrial Security Program

The Secretary of Defense has issued regulations\textsuperscript{73} which require that every classified contract granted by the Department of Defense or the individual armed services contain a clause requiring the contractor to suspend or refuse to employ on that contract any person not cleared by the service concerned with the contract.\textsuperscript{74} The individual armed services have promulgated regulations concerning the clearance of employees working on classified contracts.\textsuperscript{75} These regulations provide for the accomplishment of a Personnel Security Questionnaire (DD Form 48) which includes questions concerning past or present membership in any organization on the Attorney General's list. If derogatory information concerning the employee is found by the service investigating group, he is given notice that he will be denied clearance and that he has the right to appeal the decision to the regional Industrial Security Board. These boards are usually staffed by officers of the service denying clearance. The standard for denying clearance is “that on all information the granting of such clearance is not clearly consistent with the interest of national security.”\textsuperscript{76} Among the criteria to be considered is affiliation with or membership in “any foreign or domestic organization, association, movement, group or combination of persons [which is] totalitarian, fascist, communist, or subversive or [which has] adopted a policy of advocating or approving the commission of acts of force or violence to deny others their rights under the Constitution of the United States, or which seeks to alter the form of government of the United States by unconstitutional means.”\textsuperscript{77}

The charges presented against the employees usually include past or present membership in or association with one or more groups listed by the Attorney General. What weight is given to membership is not apparent since the ultimate decision is merely “clearance granted” or “clearance denied.”\textsuperscript{78}

The Port Security Program

By Executive Order No. 10173,79 issued under authority of the Magnuson Act,80 the President authorized the Coast Guard to conduct security checks on all waterfront employees and all seamen who are under United States jurisdiction.81 The Coast Guard has adopted regulations in compliance with this order for screening such employees.82 Under the order, clearance is denied "unless the Commandant is satisfied that the character and habits of life of the applicant are such as to authorize the belief that the presence of such individual on board a vessel or within a waterfront facility would not be inimical to the security of the United States."83 The Commandant, in granting or denying clearance, will consider whether "reasonable grounds exist for belief that the individual":84

(5) is or recently has been a member of or affiliated with any foreign or domestic organization, association, movement, group or combination of persons (i) which is or which has been designated by the Attorney General totalitarian, fascist, communist, or subversive, (ii) which has adopted or which has been designated by the Attorney General as having adopted, a policy of advocating or approving the commission of acts of force or violence to deny other persons their rights under the Constitution of the United States, or (iii) which seeks or which has been designated by the Attorney General as seeking, to alter the form of the Government of the United States by unconstitutional means; provided That access may be granted notwithstanding such membership, affiliation or association, if it is demonstrated by more than a mere denial, that the security interests of the United States will not thereby be jeopardized.

The decision to deny clearance is appealable, and at the proceeding the individual has a right to introduce evidence in his favor.85 But since no detailed charges are made against him in the initial proceeding, he actually has no way of knowing on what grounds clearance was denied. The Board need not disclose any derogatory information against the employee if this disclosure would be "imimical to national security."86

The recent case of Parker v. Lester87 decided that a hearing which did not permit the employee to cross-examine testimony of persons submitting derogatory information was not compatible with an employee's right to due process of law. The court granted to an individual who had been denied clearance relief against the Coast Guard Commandant. Judge Pope, speaking for the ninth circuit court of appeals, pointed out that88

Quaere: Since the official apparently was dismissed without even procedural safeguards, does the Myers decision imply that due process is not required?

The liberty of appellees to follow their chosen employment is no doubt a right more clearly entitled to constitutional protection than the right of a government employee to obtain or retain his job and that these regulations fall short of furnishing the minimum requirements of due process in respect to opportunity to be heard.

The Government has decided not to appeal this decision.

Independent Action by the Employer

What is the right of a private employer to discharge an employee on the ground of suspected disloyalty to the Government of the United States? The common law, in the absence of contract, recognizes no prohibitions on the right of an employer to discharge any of his employees without cause. However, many states have passed legislation which restricts the employer's rights with regard to discharge of his employees. All cases decided thus far have held these statutes inapplicable to discharges for disloyalty and have upheld the right of the employer to interrogate his employees concerning their affiliation with groups on the Attorney General's list.

In Lockheed Aircraft Corp. v. Superior Court the court held that the state statute which prohibited an employer from discharging an employee on the ground of political activity did not include a prohibition against discharge on the basis of the employer's dissatisfaction with the employee's loyalty. Under the National Labor Relations Act and the Taft-Hartley Act an employer may not discharge anyone in his employ for reasons related to union activity. Prior to the Korean War the NLRB, although indicating that suspected disloyalty might be a ground for discharge, held that past or present membership in radical groups was not sufficient evidence of disloyalty. However, since that time the Board has been more sympathetic toward this conduct on the part of the employer where the employee has failed to sign an affidavit of past or present non-membership in designated organizations. By far the most important restrictions on the employer's Executive. In United States v. Lovett, 328 U.S. 303 (1946), the Court held that proscription from the federal employment for a set number of years or forever was a "punishment" and hence such proscription by Congress was a bill of attainder and improper. See Hannegan v. Esquire, Inc., 327 U.S. 146 (1946), and Frost and Frost Trucking Co. v. Railroad Comm'n, 271 U.S. 833 (1926), holding that Congress may not use the granting of a privilege as a method of denying any constitutional rights. Presumably this would include the right to due process. In Cole v. Young, 351 U.S. 536 (1956), the Supreme Court greatly restricted the operation of the loyalty-security program by interpreting the Act, 64 Stat. 476, 5 U.S.C. §§ 22-1, 22-3, as applying only to employees holding "sensitive" positions in the government.
right to discharge an employee are contained in collective bargaining agreements. Most of these agreements provide that the employer must show reasonable grounds for discharge. Before 1950 most labor arbitration boards held that being a member of an organization on the Attorney General's list was not a "just cause" for discharge of an employee, but with the Korean conflict the attitude of the NLRB and the courts toward discharges by the employer for "disloyalty" has changed.

2. Housing

In 1952 Congress passed the so-called "Gwinn Amendment" which provided that "no housing unit constructed under the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, shall be occupied by a person who is a member of an organization designated as subversive by the Attorney General." The court contest under this statute typically arises when the local housing authority institutes eviction proceedings against tenants who have refused to sign the non-membership affidavit. Most of the decisions which have denied eviction have done so on non-constitutional grounds, and those that have permitted eviction have held that the affidavit is a reasonable requirement for persons desiring to live in housing projects which are made available, in part, by federal funds. However, in Lawson v. Housing Authority of Milwaukee the Supreme Court of Wisconsin held that possible harm from the suppression of the freedoms guaranteed by the first amendment outweighed any threatened evil posed by occupation of federally aided housing projects by past or present members of subversive organizations. Whether the list was a valid criterion for denying housing was not discussed. There has been no test of the Gwinn Amendment in the United States Supreme Court.

3. Deportation

The Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 provides that any alien who is or who has ever been a member of the Communist Party or any "totalitarian" organization or who is or has ever been a member of an organization which

111 In United States v. Remington, 191 F.2d 246 (2d Cir. 1951), the conviction of the defendant was reversed partly because the prosecutor was permitted to make numerous references to defendant's membership in organizations on the Attorney General's list. Judge Swan stated, "This was error, for the list is purely hearsay declaration by the Attorney General . . . It has no competency to prove the subversive character of the listed associations and, failing that, it could have no conceivable tendency to prove the defendant's alleged perjury even if it were shown that he belonged to some or all of the organizations listed." advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence\textsuperscript{114} shall be deported. The act provides for a hearing officer who conducts the hearing and who makes the determination.\textsuperscript{115} By virtue of this act, membership in the Communist Party is conclusive with regard to the alien's advocacy of these beliefs.\textsuperscript{116} Whether past or present membership in organizations other than the Communist Party is determinative of the holding of such beliefs is a question of fact for the hearing officer whose deportation order is final unless appealed.\textsuperscript{117}

4. Armed Forces Security Program

Every service inductee, reservist, or person on active duty is required to execute Department of Defense Form 98.\textsuperscript{118} This form contains a list of the organizations cited by the Attorney General. All personnel are required to state any affiliation they might have had with these organizations. The Departments of the Army\textsuperscript{119} and of the Air Force\textsuperscript{120} have published regulations with regard to determination of adverse reports based on form DD 98. Both regulations specifically refer to affiliations with organizations listed by the Attorney General as a criterion\textsuperscript{121} for determining whether "the appointment, enlistment, voluntary call to active duty, or retention in a regular duty status is clearly consistent with the interests of national security."\textsuperscript{122}

The personnel study made by Yarmolinsky indicates that a majority of the charges against servicemen consist of membership in or affiliation with these groups either by the serviceman himself or one of his friends or relatives.\textsuperscript{123} The burden of proof is on the soldier to rebut or refute the allegations.\textsuperscript{124} In case of an adverse finding the person must be given a "less than honorable" discharge. These types of discharges range from "general" to "undesirable."\textsuperscript{125}

A Department of the Army letter dated October 1955 instructed the Field Boards of Investigations that when considering a "security risk" case they should consider ameliorating factors such as the serviceman's age at the time of association, the length of time of membership, and the man's knowledge concerning the nature and objectives of the group.\textsuperscript{126} In a recent federal district court decision it was held that an honorable discharge was a property right, and further that\textsuperscript{127}

[I]f an honorable discharge were denied to a soldier with an unexceptionable service record, on the basis merely of pre-induction conduct it would in my opinion be a deprivation of property without due process of law, and a regulation establishing a procedure for effecting such a denial could not be authorized by statute.

Prior to this decision the Defense Department had announced that in the future all security investigations would be made before the person was inducted and all future discharges would be made solely on the basis of the individual service record, but no announcement was made concerning cases already pending.128

CONCLUSION

If a person remains a member of an organization after it has been cited, that fact seems potentially disastrous in the areas in which the list is used. Yarmolinsky cites no cases in which a present member has been given a security clearance.129

The effect of past membership in a designated organization is difficult to evaluate. Yarmolinsky cites many cases in which past members have been cleared of any suspected disloyalty, but also just as many cases in which clearance has been denied. The basis for clearance or non-clearance is not divulged, hence any weight which might have been attached to other factors, such as scienter, is impossible to ascertain. However, it can be categorically stated that past membership is sufficient basis for the presenting of the charge. Presumably, at the hearing the circumstances surrounding the membership are weighed to determine what effect the past associations will have in the final determination. What weight is assigned to either the past membership or the surrounding circumstances cannot be calculated.

Merely being charged with or suspected of disloyalty in these tense times is a harrowing experience. Yet past or present membership in an organization listed by the Attorney General is often the only basis for the charge of disloyalty.128

Even assuming that an individual is eventually cleared of the charge, the blot on his record may be hard to expunge. Inasmuch as the list is so widely used with such serious consequence the potential danger of an impeachable compilation is clearly apparent. It would seem that the present list may be challenged both as to its substance and as to the method by which it was compiled.

In Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath Justices Burton and Douglas, delivering the judgment of the Court, declared that the action of the Attorney General in listing the organizations without any form of hearing was "patently arbitrary."131 Justice Black, in his concurring opinion, stated that "the methods employed by the Attorney General exceed his authority . . . " and that "the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment would bar such condemnation without notice and a fair hearing."128 Justice Frankfurter, in another opinion, said that "the wholly summary process for the organizations is inadequate."132 Justice Jackson declared that he would reverse the decision "for lack of due process in denying a hearing at any stage."133 Despite the Joint Anti-Fascist case the Attorney General under Executive Order No. 10450\textsuperscript{135} (published two years after that case) redesignated all groups which had been previously designated under Executive Order No. 9835\textsuperscript{136} without affording them any hearing. It is true that the groups now have a right to a hearing \textit{after their designation}.\textsuperscript{137} However, at least four justices were in agreement that merely being listed was of substantial damage to the organizations themselves\textsuperscript{138} and a fifth stated that even if the groups were not themselves damaged they had standing to protest the designation to protect the rights of their members.\textsuperscript{139} At the present time no hearing in any form has been granted to any of the organizations on the list. It would appear then, that all of these groups have been designated in defiance of a ruling by the Supreme Court. However, even assuming that the Attorney General were to conform to the Court edict, the practices of listing defunct organizations and of consolidation of the list into an alphabetical roster rather than in distinct categories seem to be incorrect.

The fact that an organization is defunct precludes any possibility of its conforming to the Attorney General’s regulations and it is thus precluded from ever contradicting the Attorney General’s findings as to its character.\textsuperscript{140} Whether or not the organization itself is damaged by the listing,\textsuperscript{141} there can be no doubt that former members are potentially harmed. Yet present security procedures apparently preclude the investigation by the hearing officer of the character of any group designated by the Attorney General.\textsuperscript{142} In essence then, a former member of one of these organizations must \textit{concede} the strength of this evidence and attempt to rebut it affirmatively by introduction of other evidence.

The decision by the Attorney General to discontinue the categorization would seem to restrict whatever value the list might otherwise have in many areas where it is now being used. Many state and federal statutes proscribe membership in subversive organizations\textsuperscript{143} or in groups which advocate the overthrow of the

\textsuperscript{139} Justice Jackson, although questioning the fact of damage to the organizations themselves, declared that the organizations should have a right to contest the designation because of the harm which would come to its members. 341 U.S. 184-86.

\textsuperscript{142} See the Loyalty Review Board Memorandum No. 2, issued March 9, 1948. “Boards... should not enter upon any evidential investigation of the nature of any of the organizations identified in the Attorney General’s list, for the purpose of attacking, contradicting, or modifying the controlling conclusion reached by the Attorney General in such list.... The Board should permit no evidence or argument before it on the point.” Apparently the Boards have been following this instruction. YAKOLONSKY, Case Studies in Personnel Security 43 (1955), records the following statement made by a hearing officer in October, 1952: “This Board has no authority to question the decision of the Attorney General.”

Government by force and violence. Since these comprise only two of the six criteria which the Attorney General was instructed to use in determining the organizations to be designated, any use of the list by officials administering these programs is immediately open to objection. In addition, since the consolidation the list commonly has become known as the "subversive list," and being or having been a member of one of the groups is generally equated to the holding of subversive beliefs.

All indications would seem to point to the necessity of a re-evaluation of the need for and the scope of any publication of a list of organizations by the Executive, membership in which may be evidence of disloyalty to the Government. As has been seen, the publication of such a list has wide and serious consequences far beyond the area in which it was originally intended to operate. An Attorney General's list, properly broken down into carefully described categories and compiled after a full and fair hearing to the groups involved, might be useful for certain purposes such as employment in "sensitive" governmental positions. However, it is submitted that the list as presently constituted and compiled should be withdrawn.
